Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am glad at last to have an opportunity to yield to the admonition of my friends in the American Legion—for they are my friends—they ought to be my friends, because I have helped them consistently through the whole course of my service in this House.

I am glad to yield to this extent, that I will vote against this amendment of my good friend from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I do so with all due deference to him, and only because I think he falls into the same error of judgment as those who prepared this bill. They have tried to do something that is logically inconsistent and impossible, and he in trying to avoid their pitfall trips lightly into a similar mistake.

In other words, this bill aims to retire men who are not in the service. How can that be done? These emergency officers have been out of the service for years, and yet this bill and the Johnson amendment propose to put them on the retired list.

What does "retired" mean? Look in the dictionary. Retirement means withdrawal from the service. How can you retire men who are not in the service?

Briefly this bill provides that men who served in the World War and who happened to be lucky enough to secure commissions as emergency officers shall retroactively be put in the same position as Regular Army officers and be entitled to retirement at three-fourths pay—precisely to the same extent as though they had continued in the service and had not taken their discharges at the close of the World War. The only limitation or requirement being that they shall have suffered a 30 per cent disability. The financial significance of this is shown in the following figures. If this bill becomes a law, emergency officers with disability to the extent of only 30 per cent will receive the following retirement pay or compensation for the rest of their lives:

Brigadier general	$375.00
Colonel	250.00
Lieutenant colonel	218.75
Major	187.50
Captain	150.00
First lieutenant	125.00
Second lieutenant	93.75

Now, what does the ordinary enlisted man receive under our compensation laws? He receives $1 for each per cent of disability, so that an ex-service man with 30 per cent disability can receive only $30 per month. Our World War compensation law is considerably different from the old pension laws applicable to Civil War and Spanish War veterans. It is decidedly more liberal in the amount allowed and in the methods of administration, but it is essentially a pension law, and the fundamental characteristic of a pension law or compensation law is that relief is afforded on the basis of abstract manhood and not on the basis of rank.

After the close of the Civil War an attempt was made to pass a pension law based on rank, but it was ignominiously beaten. Again during the framing of the World War compensation act a provision was at first included providing for allowances based on a percentage of the soldiers' pay; in other words, a pension or compensation based on rank. The proposal raised a storm of objections and was stricken from the bill on the floor of the House. The American Congress was not then ripe to admit the principle that pensions should be granted upon the basis of fortuitous rank, or that the wife and children of an officer were entitled to greater consideration than the wife and children of an enlisted man. In other words, Congress then stood upon the principle; and I hope it will still adhere to it that in this democracy of ours there should be no discrimination in our pension laws between officers and men.

But the argument is made in behalf of this bill that it is a retirement act and not a pension measure. The gentlemen who make that contention are indulging in a little self-deception to ease their consciences. This is not a retirement bill. The emergency officers whom it affects have been out of the service for nine years. They were in civil life before the emergency of the war induced them to take upon themselves the duties of soldiers and they have by this time, after the lapse of nine years, returned to their original vocations.

This is simply a bill to raise the compensation of a few emergency officers. If you want to raise their compensation, introduce a bill that will frankly confront the question and raise the compensation of all alike whether officers or enlisted men. [Applause.] That is the solution of the difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is not my purpose to debate the merits of this bill. If the opportunity presents itself I intend to move to recommit the bill for the following reasons:

I have been a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation since its creation four years and more ago. No matter that has come to it has so much perplexed me as this particular proposal. On the whole I have thought that the arguments in favor of the proposal outweighed those against it, and I have voted in past years to report this proposal favorably.

This year an opportunity to hear all the arguments was refused to the minority of the committee. Those who believe that so important and far reaching a change in the policy of the United States ought to have let in upon it the light of argument, were refused hearings, refused an opportunity to listen to the facts in the case, and this bill was reported to the House without one minute of argument on its merits.

If ever a debate illuminated a subject in this body it has been the debate of the last two days. Member after Member has told me that if he had known beforehand of the facts that have been presented in this debate he would never have committed himself to the support of this measure in its present form. Had I known all these facts I never would have committed myself without further study. You may see then that here is an occasion, if there ever was one, that demands the proper functioning of the machinery of the House, set up to meet just such a contingency. The House has a right through its committees, its eyes, its ears, to have a study of the question, and a study of the question has never been given by the full committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. Therefore, not in opposition to the proposal, not in support even of the amendment which has just been presented to you, because I have not read it, and have not been informed about it, and know nothing about its details save what I have just heard—not in support of any position in this matter, but as a plea for the ordinary method of considering important proposals, and in behalf of the machinery set up by the House for its information, I trust this committee when it is resolved into the House will conclude that the wise course is to recommit the bill for further consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I hope the motion to recommit which the gentleman is going to offer will be defeated by an overwhelming vote. I remember a few weeks ago on the floor of this House, when a committee of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is a member, reported a bill to retire presidents of the Federal reserve banks, who have been receiving from $20,000 to $50,000 a year salary in their present occupation, and give them retirement pay of $8,000 or $9,000 a year, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] made an impassioned speech in behalf of the legislation.

A motion to recommit without instructions is a motion to defeat, and his last-minute attempt to defeat the emergency officers' retirement legislation does not harmonize with his position on legislation to retire bank presidents.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. Under the rule the committee will rise.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary under the rule.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAGUARDIA, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 777, the emergency officers' retirement bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. In the Committee of the Whole this bill was never voted on. Is it not necessary to vote on the bill in committee.

The SPEAKER. The committee recommends the passage of the bill. It does not pass the bill.

Mr. KEARNS. But is not it necessary for the committee to vote on the bill as to whether that committee shall recommend it for passage?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to recommit the bill, upon which motion the gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to recommit the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUCE) there were—ayes 81, noes 145.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays. Those who favor taking the vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-seven Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the motion to recommit the bill was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Forty-five Members have risen, not a sufficient number. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE SO-CALLED BOX IMMIGRATION BILL

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a statement which I made before the House Committee on Immigration on the so-called Box immigration bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent granted me I desire to call the attention of the Members to a statement which I made recently before the Immigration Committee of the House upon the so-called Box immigration bill. This bill, if enacted, would place not only Mexico, but also the Dominion of Canada within the quota provisions of the immigration act. The statement to which I refer, including the questions asked by various members of the committee, is as follows:

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appeared before this committee on a similar measure two years ago, so some of you older members of the committee already know my views with reference to it, perhaps; yet the matter is of such importance to the people of our territory that I felt justified in asking for time to appear again. I have been busy in my own committee, so I do not know the nature of the presentation that has been made up to this point.

I am interested in this bill and in its effect from two viewpoints, primarily—or at least, as to its effect in two different respects.

First, in its effect upon immigration that has been coming to the United States, and which some of us expect and hope will continue to come to us, from the Dominion of Canada; and, secondly, with respect to the immigration that comes into this country from Mexico.

Most of you know that I live up close to the Canadian border. The district which I have the honor to represent extends directly to the border. My home town is within 90 miles thereof. The people in our State, the people in Minnesota, the people generally in all of the border States travel back and forth into Canada. Each summer we see over at the Minnesota lakes, for instance—which, by the way, is the finest summer playground in the country anywhere, and we hope many of you people can come there to spend your summer vacation——

Mr. MACGREGOR (interposing). I move that the gentleman be given leave to print. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTNESS. Seriously, we find literally hundreds upon hundreds of Canadian citizens spending their vacation there, a great many people, for instance, from the city of Winnipeg and from others of the larger towns. This emphasizes the cordial relations now existing between Americans and Canadians.

I was interested in ascertaining the kind of immigration and the quantity of immigration that comes from Canada. I know from personal knowledge, of course, that the farmers that we have living in North Dakota who 20 and 30 and 40 years ago emigrated into the United States from Canada are among the thriftiest, the ablest, the most capable farmers that we can find anywhere in that country. The same is true of the business men. So I was interested, as I say, in determining something about the type of immigration that we are getting now and the quantity of it, and I took those questions up with Mr. Hull, Commissioner General of Immigration, and he sent me an interesting table which gives detailed information, and at an appropriate place I would like to have it inserted in the record.

I find from this table that in the fiscal year ended July 1, 1925, there were admitted into the United States 100,895 immigrants whose permanent residence was in Canada. In 1926 the number was 91,019, and in the fiscal year 1927 the number was 81,506.

I have stated that these were immigrants whose permanent residence was in Canada. You will note the fact that that does not mean that all of them came in outside of the quota, because some of these, though permanent residents of Canada, were born in other countries. Such would be charged under present laws to the quota of the country of their birth. So I asked for information over the telephone as to how many of these that are listed in the table furnished are also Canadian born, and the reply came back a little later that about 83 per cent of them are Canadian born. So there should be a reduction of 17 per cent if you want to ascertain the exact number that are Canadian born, and would then be chargeable to the Canadian quota if a quota were established with reference to Canada similar to the quotas established with reference to European countries.

Mr. BOX. That is because the quota restrictions now apply to those people coming through Canada who were born in European countries.

Mr. BURTNESS. Exactly. So the situation at any rate is that if you pass the Box bill we would be deprived—whether for good or for ill is, of course, the question for determination—we would be deprived of something like 75,000 Canadian-born immigrants each year. There is no good reason to suppose that that immigration is likely to decrease in the future without legislation.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Do many of those folks come to your State and to your district for farm purposes?

Mr. BURTNESS. Some of them do. Of course, it is difficult to tell just how many come to my State or come to some other State. I have not exact information on that question.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Just what kind of work do they do?

Mr. BURTNESS. I was going to come to that feature in my statement very shortly, as to the occupations of people that come in, because I have that information here; it is given in the table that I have asked leave to insert. But before I go to that, let me suggest this general observation. Some of these people that will be shut out have had contacts heretofore with the United States within the last 20 or 25 years—yes; also within the last 10 or 15 years—the Canadian Northwest has been greatly developed. Many encouragements were given to settlers by the railroads, by the immigration department of Canada, and the like. With what result? We saw leaving our States, leaving all of our Northwestern States, many of our young men and young women, going up into the Canadian Northwest, American-born citizens of the United States. They went up there, whether they were right or wrong, upon the theory that Canada offered wonderful opportunities to them. A great many of them went as brides and grooms. The young man had gone up and filed on land and came back and got married and they moved up there. They have raised their families in Canada. Some of them have come back. Quite a number of them have come back. From what I am able to learn I find that there are a lot of them still up there, American born, who hope sooner or later to sell out in Canada and come back to the United States. In the meantime they have raised children. The children are Canadian born. The passage of the Box bill would, of course, prevent these Canadian-born children, but whose parents were American born, from coming into the United States, except in such numbers as could come in within the quota that would be permitted by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us go a step further. The parents, if they took up land in Canada, took out Canadian citizenship, did they not?

Mr. BURTNESS. They have become Canadian citizens, and I was going to ask your committee the question as to whether they could come back if they had become Canadian citizens, if they could come back at all under this bill. I do not know. I am not familiar enough with the technicalities of the immigration laws and of this bill to know how the bill would apply to a person who is American born but who has gone to Canada and become a Canadian citizen and who then desires to come back to the United States. Could he come in outside of the quota or not?

Mr. BOX. The place of birth, I think, now generally controls. Of course, as to what its terms would be after the committee got through with it as to special cases like yours would be a question.

Mr. MACGREGOR. They could not come in at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Canadians returning, American born, naturalized Canadians, returning now have to pay a head tax and visa fees.

Mr. BURTNESS. They would have to come in as immigrants, but I do not know how this bill would be applied as to quota. I could not see anything in it or in the general act, from the examination that I was able to give it, to determine that question, and I decided to ask you what the conclusion would be. At any rate, it is a matter deserving your careful consideration if you determine to report a bill carrying out the general purposes of this one. I am one of those, however, who would insist most strenuously that if any person born in the United States and who had become a citizen elsewhere, as for instance in Canada, and that person who has gone to Canada and lost his citizenship in that way gets to the point where he desires to come back to the country of his birth, he ought not to be barred by reason of any arbitrary quota provision, if he is otherwise proper to be admitted; that is, if he passes the various tests that our general immigration laws provide. If he entertains no notions of government that are wrong, in so far as our policy in the United States is concerned, or anything of that sort, and is generally qualified, I feel that he ought to be admitted.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you carry that out to the people who have gone to Russia and Greece and Italy and other parts of the world?

Mr. BURTNESS. That is not the question before the committee now, because we have our quota provisions with reference to them.

The CHAIRMAN. You made quite a big statement there, that you wanted people born in the United States to have the right to return, and undertook to make it apply just to contiguous territory.

Mr. BURTNESS. If you want my view with reference to it, I will frankly say that if a person born in the United States has gone elsewhere, and if he desires to come back, and if he is a proper person under the general qualification provisions of our immigration act, outside of the quota provisions, I think that he ought to be permitted to come back.

The CHAIRMAN. You would have him throw citizenship off and on, just like taking off a shoe?

Mr. BURTNESS. No; I would not have them do that. I think the very fact that he desires to come back, after trying something else, would indicate that he thinks more of his American citizenship than he does of the citizenship that he has acquired in the meantime. I think the very fact that he is anxious to come back, after trying something else, would probably make him a better American citizen than some one perhaps who had not gone through the experience of trying to live under another flag. I think he would appreciate this country just that much more after he got back here. Of course, if it came down to the question of indeterminately running back and forth, that is another situation, and something so remote that it is not likely to occur.

Mr. MACGREGOR. How about Emma Goldman?

Mr. BURTNESS. Well, that question is very easily answered. I stated my conditions with reference to admission, namely, that the provisions of our general immigration act should be complied with in such cases. As every member of this committee knows, those provisions would bar Emma Goldman from coming back. Furthermore I do not know that Emma Goldman was American born. My impression is she was not.

Mr. MACGREGOR. She repented, though.

Mr. BURTNESS. She repented, but she has probably repented only with reference to where she desires or prefers to live. Now, if she has repented to the extent that she does not longer entertain any views antagonistic to our American principles, then you would have another proposition. Do not get the idea that I urged anything more than what I suggested. My statement was with reference to persons American born and who entertain American views, who desire to come back and who could otherwise qualify under the general provisions of our immigration act.

Coming back to what is especially before the committee now, I believe that Canadians, people born and reared under the laws of Canada, under the ideals of English-speaking people, under the ideals of representative government very similar to our own—I think any of them who want to come here and desire to live in the United States would be a distinct asset to the country, and instead of putting up the bars against them we ought to be willing to welcome them into this country. I think they occupy a considerably different position from anybody else, and that is especially true when we realize that they are living right alongside of us, only an imaginary line separating us, where intercourse between these countries is free and easy, where there are literally tens of thousands of Canadians coming into this country every year for tourist purposes and for business purposes, and in the same way even a larger number of Americans going into Canada for similar purposes. I repeat that they would be distinct assets to our own country. Every Canadian that we have ever gotten here, practically without exception, in the past has been an asset to our country, and anyone we are likely to get in the future is likely to be such.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Do a larger percentage of them become American citizens than the Norwegians and Swedes?

Mr. BURTNESS. I am not in a position to say with reference to that.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Do you think they are a greater asset as citizens than Norwegians and Swedes?

Mr. BURTNESS. I am not going to be put into the position before the committee of making a comparison between Canadian-born people and any other specific nationality, and surely not with the people from which I happen to come myself. Referring generally, however, to the northern countries of Europe, I believe that the immigrants that we have received from such countries have been very satisfactory people and have played their part in developing the United States, and I am not here to say that those of us of Norwegian origin are a bit better than those of German origin or Swedish or Irish or Scotch origin, or Canadian origin or anyone else. Nor, from pride of ancestry, do I care to admit that the Canadians are any better than those of us who happen to have Norwegian blood in our veins.

Mr. MACGREGOR. May I ask what you think about the national-origins clause that reduces the number from Scandinavian countries?

Mr. BURTNESS. Believing in a policy of restricted immigration, my opinion has been that the best law that has been reported in recent years, or at any time, from this committee is the bill that was reported by this committee and passed by Congress in 1924, and which is now the law. I think that on the whole the people that have come in under that law are probably as good—the great general average thereof—as you can get under any more or less arbitrary quota provisions. We all realize, of course, that quota provisions must be arbitrary and that none of them can be perfect.

Mr. MACGREGOR. That included the national-origins proposition. The 1924 act included that.

Mr. BURTNESS. Not as this committee reported it, but as an afterthought, written into the bill by the Senate and later approved in the House, at a time when I would take it no one knew exactly how the national-origins provision act would work out, and I do not know whether anyone now knows exactly how they would work out. I have noticed the comments made with reference to it by the three Cabinet officers a year or so ago. I referred to the bill as now operating under the quota based on the 1890 census figures, which I feel it difficult to improve upon.

Theoretically the national-origins provision sounds all right. Whether they are practical or not in operation I am not in a position to state definitely, but I doubt it very much. But that is not the question before us now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that we will not go into that. That will undoubtedly be a matter to be brought up here a little later, a separate matter.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. SCHNEIDER asked something about the class of people that come in. Just to illustrate by reference to the Canadian immigration for 1927, I find that listed as "unskilled" there are 20,703; as farmers, 3,709; as farm laborers, 3,663; as common laborers, 7,655; as servants, 4,809; draymen, hackmen, teamsters, and fishermen, 867; commercial, such as agents, bankers, hotel keepers, manufacturers, merchants, and dealers, 1,905; miscellaneous, 1,896; no occupation, mainly women and children, 35,965; skilled, 17,399; professional, 3,638. That indicates the type of work that they are likely to do when they come in here.

Now, with reference to the racial origin of these Canadian immigrants, the race from which they spring; I asked for that information and I find that in 1927, 1,048 of them were from the Dutch and Flemish, 27,248 from the English, 15,710 from French stock, 3,397 from German stock, 1,268 from Hebrew stock, 13,800 from Irish stock, 2,189 from Scandinavian stock, 13,903 from Scotch stock, and all others amounted to 2,943.

Summarizing, more than four-fifths of the Canadian immigration comes from English, Irish, Scotch, and French ancestry, more than four-fifths of them. So when we consider the question of racial characteristics of the immigration that would be barred from the Dominion of Canada by this bill, I think it must be generally conceded that the people barred do not come from races which by any appreciable number in this country have been regarded as being dangerous to American institutions.

Mr. BOX. You mean as applied to Canada?

Mr. BURTNESS. Certainly, as applied to Canada, of course. I have confined my remarks up to this time strictly to the Canadian immigration. I am trying to point out to you in my feeble way that I think it would be a mistake, from the standpoint of the United States, to bar the type of immigration that we have been getting from the Dominion of Canada. I am trying to point out that the type of immigration that we have been getting from Canada in the past, and are likely to get from Canada in the future, is the type that would be of assistance, generally speaking, in building up this country.

Mr. VINCENT. Let me ask you this question, Mr. BURTNESS, if you please. In addition to that, is it your opinion that such an act on the part of this Government would have a deleterious effect on the cordial relations that have so long existed between this country and the Dominion of Canada as a governmental entity?

Mr. BURTNESS. Very positively so, Mr. VINCENT. After referring to the type of immigration that this bill would bar, I was going to comment upon that feature, and I think that it is not necessary to spend any time with reference to it, for each of you can draw conclusions as to the effect that a bar of that kind would have upon the very fine, cordial relations existing between the United States and Canada just as well as I can. Merely mentioning the fact so as to call it to your attention is ample, or at least is all the time that I care to take in that presentation.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Right on that point, is it not true that the Canadian Government generally is not so keen about the Canadian nationals coming to the United States, because of the fact that the Canadian Government is spending large sums of money each year in replacing the Canadian nationals who come to the United States; that as fast as they come over here the Canadian Government is replacing them with aliens from European countries, from which they can secure them at large expense?

Mr. BURTNESS. I concede frankly that in the minds of the men whose work is such as to deal specifically with the development of immigration in Canada, that thought is in their minds; that they would rather not see their people come over here, and that those particular individuals perhaps would not object to a bar being put up which would prevent some of their nationals from coming here. But in so far as the people generally are concerned, and in so far as the Government generally is concerned, the question involves something which is dearer to them than simply this question of what might be a practical or feasible plan in keeping their people in their country. There is no prouder people on the face of the earth than the British people. I think it was the pride of the British people which was largely responsible for the fact that the first foreign government that settled its war debt with the United States was Great Britain. They are intensely proud, and their pride would be hurt, in my opinion, by our putting up an immigration bar of the sort proposed, for they could not help but feel that the bar was put up on some theory here in the United States that the people that we were likely to get from Canada are not wanted. And, of course, they would be justified in that belief, for why in the name of common sense would we want to put up the bar against them if we do not want to keep them out? It is the only conclusion that the Canadian people, that the British people, could reach if this country passes that kind of a bill. Now, we might soft-soap it and argue that it was not passed with the idea of reaching Canada or preventing the class of immigration we get from that country, but with the idea of reaching some other nations, or something of that sort, but that kind of an explanation would not be accepted by them, for naturally they would say: "Well, if you wanted to exempt us, that could easily have been accomplished."

Mr. BOX. Of course, you recognize that we do have a quota restriction against the English homeland?

Mr. BURTNESS. Oh, yes; but when we did that we did so with reference to all of Europe. We have placed England on exactly the same basis as we have other countries over there in Europe. Furthermore, Canada is a near neighbor and her situation seems considerably different.

Now, there is some general information contained in the letter which transmitted this table to me, and I would be glad to have both the letter and the table appear in the record.

The papers referred to follow:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION,
Washington, February 24, 1928.

Hon. OLGER B. BURTNESS, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN BURTNESS: In response to your request for statistics covering immigration from Canada under the present quota law, I am sending you herewith a statement which gives the number of immigrant aliens admitted from that country to the United States during each of the last three fiscal years 1925, 1926, and 1927, by occupational groups, with comparative per cents of the total. The statement also shows for these immigrants the number of male and female, as well as the principal races.

It will be noted that while immigration from Canada decreased from 100,895 in the year 1925 to 81,506 in 1927 there was no great change in the proportional distribution by occupations. The largest single group were those listed as no occupation, comprising 42.3 per cent of the total in 1925, 43.2 per cent in 1926, and 44.1 per cent in 1927. The percentage of unskilled workers jumped from 22 per cent in 1926 to 25.4 per cent in 1927, laborers and servants making up the increase. The professional and commercial classes, as well as the skilled wage earners, show about the same proportion for the three years, the professional comprising an average per cent for the period of 4.4, the commercial 2.6, and the skilled 21.9. The bulk of these newcomers are English, French, Irish, and Scotch, over four-fifths of the immigrants from Canada being of these four races.

During the three fiscal years 1922, 1923, and 1924 (under the per cent limit act of 1921) immigrant aliens admitted from Canada and Newfoundland numbered 46,810, 117,011, and 200,690, respectively, about 97 per cent coming from Canada and 3 per cent from Newfoundland. Prior to 1925 these countries were not shown separately in immigration statistics.

Very truly yours,

HARRY E. HULL, Commissioner General.

Immigrant aliens admitted to the United States from Canada (last permanent residence), fiscal years ended June 30, 1925, 1926, and 1927, by occupational groups, with comparative per cent, as specified

Occupation	Number admitted, fiscal year—			Per cent of total
	1925	1926	1027	1925	1926	1927
Total	100,895	91,019	81,506	100.0	100.0	100.0
Professional	4,494	3,789	3,638	4.5	4.2	4.5

If there are no further questions on the Canadian aspect of the bill, I want to turn to the second aspect that I stated I wanted to discuss; and I want to be very brief on that, for I take it that it has been considered more in detail before the committee by other witnesses. That is the question with reference to the need or lack of need of Mexican labor up in our part of the country and why so many of our people in comparatively recent years have become interested in Mexican labor and therefore in Mexican immigration.

All of you who are familiar with the proposals of farm relief that have been pending in Congress now for a number of years know something about the situation in the agricultural game. You know that one of the most serious difficulties in so far as the prosperity of agriculture is concerned is the fact that this country has been continuing to raise an exportable surplus of certain crops, resulting in depressing the price of such crops down to the standard of world markets. Now, that surplus is not something new, it is true. It has existed for decades past, but the effect that that exportable surplus has had upon prices seems to have become a more important factor in recent years than heretofore. At least American conditions generally, our general price level, high wages, our standard of living, costs of production, and all such factors have become such that it is much harder for the American farmer to compete with a foreign farmer in the case of these crops or products of which we have an exportable surplus. That situation applies in an aggravated form in all territories which have been regarded as more or less of a one-crop territory raising an export surplus crop. So naturally it applies with added force to what we know, generally speaking, as the great spring-wheat area. And so for the last 20 or 30 years there has been a strong incentive for a program up there of diversified farming. The war came along and set us back in that program tremendously, because of the demand to raise more wheat. But we have again started to advance that program, and are showing wonderful results in so far as diversification is concerned; but, of course, in order to proceed intelligently in diversification when we are trying to get away from the evils of one crop of which we have an exportable surplus we naturally want to exercise some sense and some judgment so that we will not simply go from the frying pan into the fire or just change our system from one crop to another just as bad. Of course, we believe in keeping more dairy cows and having more hogs and raising more beef, including feed and forage for these animals, and things of that sort. And we are doing it. We are making increases by leaps and bounds. My State shows a wonderful advance in that respect.

But what do we find? What is the situation right to-day, for instance, with reference to hogs, with reference to pork? This country has a substantial exportable surplus, especially in the lard end. We have a situation where pork to-day is selling at a much lower price than it has for years, and selling at a price—and I take it Mr. White will agree with me—that it is very doubtful whether the most efficient farmers can raise a hog for the amount that one can get for him now at the packing plants. Surely hog production should not be further increased in the United States as a whole.

We turn to dairy products, and what do we find? We find that we are just about at the danger line. We find that if we are going to increase our dairy products to speak of, if we are going to increase them as much as it would be possible to increase them in just two or three States in the Northwest within the next five years, we would be on an exportable surplus basis with reference also to dairy products. And when that time comes, the tariff of 12 cents on butter, raised from 8 cents to 12 cents a year or so ago; would not be worth a tinker's darn to the producer of dairy products. We are approaching the saturation point for domestic consumption. We are right at the danger line. So we can not turn to dairying alone without running the chance of hurting dairy interests of other States and possibly not get much benefit ourselves.

If we consider the raising of beef cattle, there is some leeway there, perhaps, and a little bit here and there along other general lines, but with reference to almost all of them, a substantial increase in half a dozen States for a period of five years would put them in the class where an exportable surplus would exist bringing prices down to the level of world markets regardless of the tariff.

So we turn to sugar, the raising of sugar beets. You know what the facts are, that have been brought out here time and again. There is no possibility of any exportable surplus in sugar. We raise only about 20 per cent of our needs in this country. And so our interest in the Mexicans, I admit, is somewhat of a selfish interest, in so far as a desire to develop our country so as to place our agriculture on a sound economic basis can be called a selfish interest.

The CHAIRMAN. No; I do not think that should be called a selfish interest.

Mr. BURTNESS. I think a certain amount of selfishness of that kind is entirely justified.

Mr. BOX. Well, it certainly is a legitimate interest, so far as that goes.

Mr. BURTNESS. I think it is justified and legitimate. That is the position I am taking.

We have constructed a beet-sugar mill at East Grand Forks, Minn., directly across the river from my home town, which is taking care of the production of beets in that portion of the Red River Valley. Other sugar factories are contemplated elsewhere in the famous valley of the Red River of the North. If we are going to take some acreage away from wheat, if we are going to take some acreage away from corn, if we are going to take some acreage away from providing the feeds that are used in the production of more hogs than this country needs, then we have to rely upon some such crop as sugar beets; and with reference to the hand labor required in the production of sugar beets, we are absolutely dependent upon Mexican labor. Others doubtless have emphasized this feature of the case, so I will spend no time thereon.

I have two farms in the Red River Valley. On one of those I have raised sugar beets for four years. I have been in fairly close touch, because of that fact, with these Mexicans that have come up to our country. I am not going to stand here and tell you that they are the best people on the face of the earth or that they have made wonderful citizens or that in a few years their sons and daughters will be graduating from our high schools and soon acting as our preachers and lawyers and doctors and as our professors in colleges, or anything of that sort. If they were going to do that, I do not know that we would want them. Surely we wouldn't need them. I sometimes think we have enough law students and doctors and Congressmen and such forms of animal life as it is. [Laughter.] I think it was Mr. Hogan who said that the lowest form of animal life is a Congressman. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOX. I think that ought to be stricken from the record. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTNESS. I comprehend that the interests of sound public policy might not permit it to stay in. But, seriously, all of you who are familiar with farming conditions in an agricultural country, such as the winter-wheat country, spring-wheat country, or any other section where the farming is not arranged so that there is just as much work to do every month of the year as there is in certain months of the year, know that all of these territories are dependent upon transient labor in rush seasons. We provide in Congress for the United States Employment Service, a wonderful service that starts out in the early summer down in the Southern States, Texas and Oklahoma, and directs that general transient farm labor, tries to direct them as the harvest progress from the Southern States up to the Canadian border. We have always been dependent upon that type of transient labor in the spring-wheat country, and I presume that you have been dependent upon it in the winter-wheat country to a considerable extent, have you not, Mr. WHITE?

Mr. WHITE. To some extent; yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. That labor has not always been the very finest type of American manhood. Their ideals are not always the very highest as they come to us, and they are generally called "hoboes." Of course, we all know that when fall comes, when that transient white labor arrives, much of which is even American born, I regret to say, it seems necessary for every little town to put on some special guards, and that citizens of such towns will often take their turns guarding the streets at night in order to prevent holdups, burglaries, and robberies and crimes of that sort. I regret to note that every year every prosecuting officer, every sheriff, every constable, spends a couple of pretty busy months in trying to protect part of this transient white labor against holdups, robberies, and other crimes by the other part of that labor, as well as to protect the property and the people generally.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. That group has done all of your work heretofore, have they not?

Mr. BURTNESS. They have done this special wheat work; yes. They come up for one sole purpose: They try to get there in time to start harvesting the wheat. If they are there a few days earlier and are absolutely busted, you are able to hire a few of them to go out for a few days' haying.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Is it not true that they do not come up before that time because there is no work there?

Mr. BURTNESS. Oh, no; with conditions as they are now we have use for some of them during haying time.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. I am really referring to them before harvest time.

Mr. BURTNESS. We have always needed some of them for haying, not as many for haying, of course, as for the harvesting season. They will ordinarily not do any other work than a harvesting job, and as soon as the first threshing machine starts, it is only the exceptions among them who will finish up the shocking jobs on the different farms. They want to thresh, they seem to like the sociability and the glamor of the larger threshing outfits. And when the threshing is done, or whenever they are delayed in threshing because of wet weather or other reason you can not even think of getting the average one of them to spend a few days plowing or hauling sugar beets or anything of that sort, or harvesting sugar beets. It is out of the question. They will not do it. They are there for the wheat harvest. Of course, there are exceptions among them.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I noticed in the statement you presented that a very large number of Canadians, unskilled Canadians, came over to this country. Can you tell us where they went?

Mr. BURTNESS. I think they scatter all over the country.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. They do not stop in the Dakota beet fields? They are not interested in that work?

Mr. BURTNESS. Some of them stop in Dakota, but not for beet work. We get our share of them. But I do not mean to try to say that most of them stop in the Dakotas. They come in more or less all along the line, and I think you will find them scattered generally along the northern border of the United States. I have never heard of them working in beet fields.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Do you know anything about the cultivation and growing of cotton?

Mr. BURTNESS. No.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Well, I never saw sugar beets growing. I have seen the old-fashioned beets grown in my section, not the sugar beet, but there is no crop that we can plant that takes longer hours and a longer season to make than cotton takes. It is hard work for, some say, 13 months in the year. It takes that much to make a crop. We find that white people down our way—working in the harvesting of cotton requires a constant stooping position, they have to pick it stooping over—we have a class of white people in my country who would not work in cotton for a long time because the negro was there. They thought it was a negro job to do this work, and they drifted north. I find that hundreds and hundreds of our white boys and white men and even white women, I am sorry to say, have been forced into the fields and are actually cultivating, working, and gathering these crops.

Mr. BURTNESS. Well, that is very interesting, I am sure.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. And I am just presenting that to show that the work in your beets is not as hard as the growing of cotton in the South, and there are white people doing that.

Mr. BURTNESS. Of course, there is quite a difference, it would seem to me, in the application of the theory that might be in your mind, that eventually the white people would do this work in the beets if we did not get Mexicans. I think there is this big difference: You are talking about the cotton country, where your crop is cotton. That is your main crop. You are not trying to get people switched off into a new crop that involves harder work than the crop they have been raising all the time.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. But I do not think they could be carried into any field of activity that would be any harder work than the production of cotton.

Mr. BURTNESS. But our people are engaged, generally speaking, in ordinary farming, livestock, dairying, the raising of wheat, flax, oats, barley, corn, and crops of that sort. Our farmers and the white-farm labor can find plenty of opportunity to spend up to 12 or 14 hours per day in that work. They have to do it in order to keep their farms going in the ordinary way. They can not on the ordinary farm switch and intensively cultivate 10 acres or 15 acres or any other acreages of beets because if they did that they would have to let much of the rest of their farm stand idle. The acreage of beets, of course, as compared with the total acreage of the farms, is small.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The reason I presented the little argument I did is I am not convinced that you can not get labor to make your sugar beets, cultivate your sugar beets, if you would give the white American steady employment at good wages. That is the argument.

Mr. BURTNESS. I am satisfied they can not be obtained. You mention the question of good wages. Let us see whether the Mexican is getting good wages in our section. I find, for instance, what the Mexican has received on the farm that I have, each year. One or two years we had just a husband and wife without any children; the last two years we had quite a good-sized family, so that the wife did not do any work in the field whatsoever, but a couple of the older children were able to help the father. They handled 16 acres of sugar beets. For that work they received $400. I presume their work altogether—these beet men could tell you perhaps more definitely than I can—I presume in the doing of that work, thinning, blocking, hoeing, and topping, they worked altogether about three months. The rest of the time they were either idle or were working by the day, doing other work, on our farm and adjoining farms, and the doing of this other work is an asset to the country there, because farm labor is scarce. It is intensely scarce throughout that section and we are dependent upon farm labor. When you have farms which average about 450 acres each, as we have in our State, the husband and the wife and the children, even if they all work, can not perform all the labor upon the farm during the farming season. Hired help is necessary. So these men, these Mexicans, are employed in their spare time. They put up alfalfa, they do considerable shocking of grain, and until they have to top the beets they go out on the threshing outfits and they help thresh. Each Mexican desirous of putting in his time—and most of them do, for most of them are thrifty and willing to work—can earn a couple hundred dollars in addition to what they are paid for the beets. So that means that that Mexican, for instance, on our farm has earned each of these seasons about $600, which is $200 more than the average farm laborer that hires out for the season of eight months with us would have earned in the meantime.

But, of course, the usual farm laborer working during the season for a monthly wage, would in addition to that have his board and his lodging; whereas the Mexicans get their home, provided with stoves and dishes and beds and a little furniture and things of that sort that they need. But they do not get their food. They buy their own food. So the wages are good. Most of them leave in the fall with an automobile.

But I have gotten away from the statement that I wanted to make. I want to say this, and I say it advisedly, and I say it as one who has had 10 years' experience in a prosecuting office: That since the Mexicans came there there has been relatively less trouble with the Mexican labor that comes to us in proportion to the numbers that have come than there has been with the customary white transient labor that has come to us. I am willing at any time to compare the Mexican labor, in so far as creating trouble in the community, in so far as petty thievery or other crimes is concerned—I am willing to compare them any time with the other transient labor that comes up into our section; and I think the comparison will be favorable enough to the Mexicans.

So we are not alarmed of them on that score at all. We are dependent upon transient labor anyway, and we know from the experience that we have had now over a period of several years that there is not any appreciable danger to look for on that score. The other propositions that are involved as to the habits of the Mexicans, what they do, etc., have doubtless been rehashed before you several times, and I do not want to take up any more time on that feature. I do, however, want to emphasize that I feel we would be making a tremendous international mistake if we put up the proposed immigration bars against contiguous, friendly neighboring countries, and especially so if we put up that sort of a bar against our neighbor on the north. Even with the splendid assistance of Colonel Lindbergh our international relations are sufficiently strained now.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Have you an ample supply of labor in the dairy industry?

Mr. BURTNESS. One of the difficulties in developing the dairy industry on a large scale is that of getting the necessary labor. So our development of the dairy industry, which has been tremendous, has come about by the work that is contributed by the farmer himself and his family.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. And you have about reached the saturation point so far as production is concerned?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes, sir; that is for domestic needs.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. If these Mexicans are allowed to come in in great numbers, increased numbers, and you begin to employ them in your dairy industry, will not your dairy industry be affected just like wheat and corn are now?

Mr. BURTNESS. I do not think there is any prospect of these Mexicans ever being employed in the dairy industry.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Why not?

Mr. BURTNESS. Under our system of farming, of course, the development of our dairy industry is going to be largely a family development. It is not going to be a proposition which employs all the year round labor.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. If they are so satisfactory to grow your beets and harvest your beets as unskilled labor, why would they not be good as unskilled labor in the dairy business?

Mr. BURTNESS. I do not take it that labor in the dairy business is unskilled labor, unless you have a tremendously large dairy business so that you can divide your labor up into certain classes. But if you are going to have a man such as would be used on a good-sized farm to take care of a herd of 20 or 30 milk cows and other incidental stock, you do not want an unskilled man for that sort of a job. For that work you need a man that can learn the value of various feeds, know what kind of feeds are to be fed to your dairy animals, the proper amount of protein and other items which must necessarily be fed to cattle in order to get them to produce milk. They have to use their heads a whole lot more than their backs, and one of the difficulties in the evelopment of the dairy industry even among our farmers is the fact that it is difficult to get them to learn the underlying principles that are involved in really first producing a good dairy cow and then in getting the best results from such cow.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I would draw the conclusion that it does not take any brains to make beets?

Mr. BURTNESS. I think that is pretty nearly true; that when it comes down to the actual work, the hand labor in the field, a great deal of brains is not needed. I think I will agree with you that it needs a strong back rather than a strong head for the purpose. We might as well be perfectly frank about it, for this labor is unskilled and the work seems like drudgery. But that certainly does not apply to the dairy business or to most forms of farming now. And, of course, in the beet industry the brain work, the development of the right kind of fertilizer, the determination of what kind of soil will produce the greatest amount of beets and things of that sort is done by somebody else and not by the individual Mexican who gets down on his knees and thins the beets and blocks them and tops them in the fall. This is supervised by experts and the farmer's equipment and regular help prepares the ground for the beets and does the machine cultivation, lifting the beets when they are harvested, and such work.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. BURTNESS, you are on one of the big committees of the House engaged in national problems, and your colleague has appeared, Mr. ANDRESEN, and Mr. SELVIG also. They are on very large, important committees handling problems of agriculture. You get national problems, and we have got one here, and it is expressed in a resolution that has just come in by telegraph from Tucson, Ariz.:

"Whereas American laborers leaving Southwest in increasing numbers account of inability to compete with cheap Mexican labor, which is annually flooding this section in increasing numbers; and

"Whereas this migration of labor from our section materially adds to unemployment problem in Eastern and other States; and

"Whereas present immigration laws notoriously inadequate to stem influx of Mexican labor:

"Resolved, That local union of carpenters unanimously favor Box bill.

"I. A. MCBEE, Secretary."

Now, you see the situation may not be extremely acute yet, but it is coming, marching along, and the studies of this committee over several years show that tendency. Now, that Mexican labor has extended clear north to the Canadian line, to the district represented by you. That labor drifts into the cities in ever-increasing numbers, makes congestion, creates bread lines.

Mr. BURTNESS. I appreciate the very important question, the national question, the American question that is before this committee, and I personally appreciate the very large amount of study and consideration that this committee has given to these questions in all of these years since the war. I want to assure you that I do not take the position that this is a one-sided proposition, the Box bill or any other question before the Immigration Committee. I entertain fairly definite views, which I have tried to present fairly and frankly.

I do want to say with reference to that telegram, I do not know on what facts it is based, but we all know a little something about how easy it is to get wires sent in, whether it be on one side or on another side of any question. There is a corn sugar bill, so called, pending before our committee—or it was pending before our committee two years ago; it is now before the Agricultural Committee. I believe that every person who has ever raised a bee during the last few years, and every person who hopes to raise a bee in the next few years, has written or wired me as to the terrible things that will happen if that bill is passed. Propaganda of every kind on every conceivable question inspired by some one comes to all of us. I do not know whether this particular wire falls within that category or not, but I for one do not attribute a great deal of importance to them, except when they actually present facts or persuasive arguments, and you get the facts otherwise, ordinarily. I do not pay much more attention to them than I do to petitions asking me to appoint a certain man postmaster in a certain town, when I find that the same individual name is affixed to three different petitions for three different candidates for the same job. I rather doubt whether the carpenters in the Southwest are seriously threatened by the influx of Mexican labor. However, you have means of getting at the facts in that respect, and I know you will.

Mr. Chairman, I have some petitions that were sent me that I would like to file. They are signed by beet growers in the district I represent protesting against the passage of the Box bill.

Before closing let me bring out an interesting sidelight as to the Canadians. There are in Congress only 18 Members who are foreign born—3 Senators and 15 Representatives. Of these, six were born in Canada, speaking well for our immigrants from that country as well as for the fact that Canadian ideals and principles of government are similar to our own. Those of Canadian birth are Senator COUZENS, of Michigan; and Representatives EATON, of New Jersey; SINCLAIR, of North Dakota; CHALMERS, of Ohio; MONAST, of Rhode Island; and HUGHES, of West Virginia. There are doubtless many of the second generation. I feel justified in claiming that these, our colleagues, are exhibits amply justifying the position I have taken before you to-day. I greatly appreciate the marked attention you have given to my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. We are very much obliged to you, Mr. BURTNESS.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon three bills pending relating to Muscle Shoals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker it may be interesting and valuable information for the Members of the House and the country at large to have a brief summary of some of the views that have been entertained heretofore by distinguished and prominent and responsible public officials and Members of Congress. It must be constantly borne in mind that we are not now put to the choice between the private operation and public operation of the properties at Muscle Shoals. There is no bill before the Congress that Members have the opportunity to choose and that calls for the private operation of this huge Government project.

It is true that there is one bill before both the House and Senate—known in the House as the Madden bill and known in the Senate as the Willis bill—contemplating the leasing of the Muscle Shoals property to the Air Nitrates Corporation, a thousand-dollar subsidiary of the American Cyanamid Co., which undertakes to guarantee the performance of the proposed contract by its subsidiary. But both the Hon. Frank B. Willis, late Senator from Ohio, and the Hon. Martin B. Madden, late a Representative from the State of Illinois, are now dead. Furthermore, it appears that the Willis bill in the Senate, contemplating the leasing of the Muscle Shoals property to the said Air Nitrates Corporation, was not seriously considered by either the Senate Committee on Agriculture or the Senate itself. It does not appear that the offer of the Air Nitrates Corporation was pressed seriously and energetically before the Senate. The sole question before the Senate seems to have been whether or not to accept the Norris bill or do nothing at all.

In like manner the Madden bill, which was before the Military Affairs Committee of the House, is not now before the House of Representatives. This bill was very earnestly considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. As a member of that committee, I worked hard and long to try to perfect that bill in such a way as to be able to defend it before the House of Representatives. I offered a large number of amendments to that bill, which were finally accepted by the Air Nitrates Corporation and included in its proposal. Some idea of the scope and purport of the amendments offered by me may be obtained by considering the difference between the original bill which was introduced in the Sixty-ninth Congress and the last committee print of the bill introduced in the Seventieth Congress as the two appear side by side, in parallel columns, commencing on page 43 of the committee print of an appendix to Report No. 1095. But on three very vital and important questions the Air Nitrates Corporation did not agree to the views of the committee, and for that reason we were never able to report its bill contemplating private operation. The three points of difference between the Air Nitrates Corporation, commonly called the American Cyanamid Co., and the overwhelming majority of the committee were these:

First. A "recapture clause" whereby the property would be returned to the United States upon the complete and undisputed failure of the Air Nitrates Corporation to carry out the main purpose and intention of the lease, which was and would be the use of the property in question for the manufacture of chemical fertilizers.

Second. Failure to agree upon a clause contemplating adequate auditing and accounting of the books of the lessee corporation relating to the manufacture of fertilizers in order to insure the truth as to the costs of such fertilizers.

Third. Failure to agree with the Air Nitrates Corporation upon a provision in the bill to confer sufficient and ample powers upon a board set up in the bill called the Farmer Board whereby said board could specify the kinds and qualities of fertilizers to be manufactured by the lessee corporation, it being the belief of the committee that such "farmer board" would better know what kinds and qualities of fertilizers the farmers would buy than the corporation itself, and thus prevent the corporation from manufacturing fertilizers and putting the same in storage and holding them in storage, and finally, shutting down the fertilizer plants upon the ground that the farmers would not buy the product, and thus the lessee corporation be excused from continuing to operate the fertilizer plant.

Mr. Speaker, the House is now squarely against the proposition of Government operation by some agency or instrumentality at Muscle Shoals. The Government is in operation of the plant now, producing electric power and selling the same, and thus is in business as truly, though in a different kind of business, as it would be in manufacturing and selling fertilizers. There would be more excuse and reason for the manufacture of nitrates and the sale of same than there is for the production and sale of electric power. The Government needs nitrates for explosives for its war-making departments, both in peace and in war. But the Government does not need electric power for its own sake and solely as electric power, either in peace or in war. It is justified in producing electric power solely to employ the same in the manufacture of nitrates for war and for the sale of such surplus nitrates as may not be necessary for war purposes. Furthermore, the only three bills before the House now all contemplate Government operation of the properties at Muscle Shoals. The Norris bill is a Government-operation plan, pure and simple, directing the Secretary of Agriculture to manufacture fertilizers, not only at Muscle Shoals but "elsewhere in the United States," in the "largest amounts practicable and at the lowest prices practicable."

The substitute for the Norris bill which is offered by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, and known as the Morin bill, contemplates operation by a Government-owned corporation, whose directors shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

The three choices of the Members of the House is the Snell bill, recently introduced by the Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL, of New York, and he has announced his intention to offer his bill as a substitute for the committee amendment which in turn is pending as a substitute for the Norris bill. The Snell bill is Government operation, pure and simple.

Consequently there is no choice as between Government operation and private operation. Private interests have always looked contemptuously and sneeringly at the Muscle Shoals project. Shortly after the war, private interests declared that the properties there should be scrapped. Private interests have not only neglected to cooperate with the Government in settling and disposing of the Muscle Shoals question, but they seem to have consciously and deliberately thrown every obstacle and difficulty in the way of a reasonable and businesslike settlement of the problem.

Consequently the question before the House is this: Which of the three bills—the Norris bill, the Morin bill, or the Snell bill—offers the most practicable, reasonable, and safe business set-up for the economical and efficient management of the Government properties at Muscle Shoals?

VIEWS OF HON. MARTIN B. MADDEN (DECEASED)

I respectfully call your attention to the language employed by the late lamented and highly honored Martin B. Madden, spoken before the Committee on Military Affairs, January 31, 1927, relating to the production of fertilizers at Muscle Shoals for the relief of American agriculture and for the upbuilding of American soils:

There is a fine place in the industrial life of the United States for the power companies. They serve a useful purpose. They are doing a wonderful thing in the development of power and its distribution. They are making for better conditions in many neighborhoods. I have no complaint to make of them. I am not here to denounce them or to say anything against them. But at best, you could not use the power that is created at Muscle Shoals through the power companies except as a local enterprise.

Why do I say that? You can not distribute successfully or profitably power for power purposes that may be created here or anywhere else for more than 300 miles. So that when you limit the scope of an activity to 300 miles you are bound to make it a local institution; whereas the manufacture of fertilizer and the purposes for which it is to be used are just as wide as the Nation.

If we are going to invest Government money in anything less than a national proposition, we ought to know about it. If there were no other use for this power I would hail the entry of the power companies into this proposition.

But, as the servants of the American people, as the public servants of the Nation, we ought to do everything within our power, as far as we can see the right way to do it, for the advancement of the best interests of as many of all the people as possible and not for just a few.

So I stand unalterably committed to the policy of utilization of Muscle Shoals for the national problem of defense in time of war and the national problem of prosperity in time of peace, by the creation of fertilizer and its utilization by the people who are engaged in agriculture, without whose prosperity we all suffer.

The farmers ask fertilizer relief at Muscle Shoals. They are not asking for much. They have a right to ask it; in fact, we have promised it to them, and now let us fulfill our promise by accepting the Cyanamid Co.'s offer.

The farmers are only asking the dedication of this plant to the purposes for which it was originally constructed. They want the faith of the Government kept by the utilization of the agency that has been created by the money of the people, for the purpose for which it was created; that is all.

To tell the farmers that water power at Muscle Shoals should not be used to make fertilizers is to mock, in my judgment, at their needs when more than 3,000,000 horsepower can be developed on the Tennessee River.

Again let me call your attention to the language of Hon. Newton D. Baker, then Secretary of War, spoken before the Committee on Military Affairs on April 19, 1920:

The Germans, prior to the war, had developed the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by two or three processes, notably the Haber process and the cyanamide process. They were our main sources of reliance. There is a third process which is successful in the production of nitrogen, known as the arc process, where electric power can be obtained at an exceedingly low rate. It is available in countries like Norway and Sweden, where the natural water powers are very easily used, but it is conceded, I think, to be a very expensive process where the item of power is a matter at all of cost. In fact, the importations of Chilean saltpeter into this country prior to the war amounted to about 500,000 tons. Its use was primarily for fertilizer. After we entered the war the question of production of explosives came up, and it was deemed advisable to multiply the powder plants in this country and to increase the sources of fixed nitrogen as far as possible, because it was cheaper to make the powder in this country and send it to France or England than it was to send the ingredients to those countries, all of them relying upon the same source of supply for raw materials. As I recall the figures, it was necessary to ship to France or England 7 pounds of ingredients for each pound of powder manufactured, and as the tonnage situation was critical and always had to be considered, it was deemed wiser to make the powder in this country and ship it as powder instead of shipping the ingredients.

Our program for powder production was a very large program. The powder plants with which this committee is familiar, at Old Hickory and near Charleston, W. Va., were both designed in response to the proposed demands for the importation of Chilean nitrates, and, of course, are completed up to the highest possible point. Ships were taken from many other trades and put into the nitrate trade. Perhaps one of the most acute distresses of the war on our side was the New England coal situation, which was largely caused by the essential necessity of taking ships which otherwise might have carried coal to New England to bring nitrates from Chile. It demonstrated to us that we were entirely dependent or almost dependent upon the importation of nitrates from Chile for supply in an emergency. In the meantime, during the war the agricultural interests of the country were deprived of a very large part of the nitrogen which they had previously been able to get. Congress was called upon to appropriate a very large sum of money and place it at the disposal of the Secretary of Agriculture to secure the importation of nitrogen to relieve the agricultural distress. As the members of the committee will remember, that created a revolving fund, and I think there was some money made by the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration of that fund.

Mr. ANTHONY. Would the plant as you propose to operate it furnish all the nitrates required by our Government during times of peace?

Secretary BAKER. More than to supply the amount that we need currently, as I understand it; I was coming to that in another aspect of the problem, but I will state it now in this way:

The War Department has studied very carefully the need of a nitrate reserve. We have learned that wars break out very suddenly and that the emergency is very great as soon as they do break out. For this reason, and because we have this plant and that we depend so much upon importations from a foreign country, some distance away, which might be very seriously impaired by a very simple thing—everybody knows, it is no secret, that an injury to the Panama Canal would be a very serious obstacle to our access to the nitrates, and with all the safeguards that we throw around the Panama Canal injuries to it are not inconceivable, nor would they be particularly difficult even with all the safeguards that we can throw around it—and realizing the isolation of America from this raw material, on that theory the War Department has determined that it is not safe for it to have a reserve stock of less than 300,000 tons of nitrates. We have now 300,000 tons of nitrates. A study of that problem, however, led the Ordnance Department to believe this, that if Congress would authorize this plant to operate in the manner which we advise, that we could then cut our nitrate reserve safely to 150,000 tons and rely on this plant to make up the residue in the event of an emergency by turning it instantly from an agricultural production into this war-time production.

Mr. MILLER. I do not see why it could not be operated as a governmental enterprise.

Secretary BAKER. Here are some of the reasons. In the first place, there is no difficulty about it being available for the War Department in the event of need. The Panama Railroad, as you may recall, is an independent corporation. The Government, when it bought the Panama Canal rights from the French, deemed it wiser not to consolidate the administration for the reason that it was in a competitive business. The Panama Railroad operates steamers to Colon and elsewhere, and it is in competition and in trade relations and transportation relations with railroads and other lines of steamers, and it has to be very flexible in order to meet the changing rates, provide through bills of lading, and respond quickly to claims for loss and damage, demurrage, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. CALDWELL. And to sue and to be sued?

Secretary BAKER. As a commercial enterprise.

This plant when operated for the production of commercial fertilizer will be dealing with persons buying its product and buying raw materials in a competitive market, and as a commercial enterprise it will be easier to deal with that sort of people. If we operate it as a Government plant, unless you change the law, the income will have to go into the miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury and be appropriated for specific objects and be expended on an appropriation basis rather than on a commercial basis; the income and outgo is very much less flexible in dealing with persons.

Again let me call your attention to the language of Representative GREENE, then a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, spoken on April 19, 1920, and now one of the Senators from Vermont:

Mr. GREENE. It does not strike me that it is the business of the Government to go into the fertilizer-making business; but so far as this thing is concerned, we need not stress that at all. If, in providing for its own supply of munitions the Government has a by-product that happens to benefit some other industry of the country, we can not avoid it; but I would not go into it for that purpose.

Again let me call your attention to the language of Gen. C. C. Williams, Chief of Ordnance, spoken on April 19, 1920:

General WILLIAMS. Our first thought was not to operate these plants as Government enterprises but to interest private capital and get them to continue the operation, and we tried for six months, in every way that we could, to interest the manufacturers in taking over this plant, but without success. Now, as I said before, our primary concern being the maintenance of a plant like this in operation for a war insurance, the only way that we saw to accomplish it was by recommending that the Government take this plant and operate it.

Furthermore, I direct special attention to the language extracted from the report of General Pershing filed March 29, 1920:

[Extract from General Pershing's report of March 23 to the Secretary of War]

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS, AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
March 29, 1920.

* * * * * * *

Muscle Shoals nitrate plant: In the Muscle Shoals nitrate plant the Government has a permanent installation which is of the greatest importance. In another war a plant assuring a domestic supply of nitrogen might well be a decisive factor in maintaining our security. It is understood that this plant can be utilized in peace for the commercial manufacture of nitrogen products and that such use would return a reasonable profit on the investment represented by the plant while maintaining it constantly available for military purposes.

Note the following table of importations of Chilean nitrates into the United States for the years indicated:

Nitrate of soda imports from Chile to the United States

Fiscal year	Quantity	Value at Chilean port	Average value at Chilean port per 100 pounds	Export duty paid to Chilean Government
1911	546,525	$17,101,140	$1.40	$6,847,958.25
1912	481,739	15,431,892	1.43	6,036,189.67
1913	589,136	20,718,968	1.57	7,381,874.08
1914	564,049	17,950,786	1.42	7,067,533.97
1915	577,122	16,355,701	1.26	7,231,338.66
1916	1,071,728	32,129,397	1.35	13,428,751.84
1917	1,261,659	44,231,240	1.57	15,808,587.27
1918	1,607,020	70,129,026	1.95	20,135,960.60
1919	1,346,679	68,229,548	2.27	16,873,887.87
Total	13,313,674	480,087,148		163,647,680.68

NOTE.—The value given here is based on the value at the port in Chile, and does not include export duty paid to the Chilean Government, ocean freight, insurance, commissions, etc. Before 1914, freight from Chile to the United States was about $7.50 per ton; at the present time it is about $17.50.

In 1879 export duty was put on nitrate shipments from Chile and amounted to about $4.18 per long ton. In 1880 this duty was raised to $12.53 per long ton, and has not been changed since that time.

As to the requirements of nitrogen for military purposes, I call your attention to the following extract from a statement made by Colonel Burns, of the United States Army:

REQUIREMENTS OF NITROGEN FOR STRICTLY MILITARY PURPOSES

With the development of the nitrification of cellulose, toluol, glycerin, etc., and their tremendous consumption in shell, mines, bombs, etc., the demand for suitable fixed-nitrogen compounds for war purposes has very materially increased.

We have already seen how Sweden by its farms was able to produce only some 100 tons of nitrate per year, which would equal about 14 tons of nitrogen.

In the Napoleonic wars, France produced 2,000 tons of nitrate per year, equal to 280 tons of nitrogen, or over twenty times Sweden's consumption. With the man power, armament, and rate of fire in effect at the time of the armistice, one division required for its powder and explosives approximately 3,000 tons of fixed nitrogen per year, or over ten times the amount used by the entire French Army per year during the French revolutionary period.

A study of Mr. Crowell's America's Munitions shows quite conclusively how extremely large has been the increase in the rate of fire of ammunition and in the total consumption thereof. It shows that during one month of 1918—which was the average of the year 1918—the French and British consumed over two and one-half times the number of rounds of artillery ammunition that were consumed by the Union forces during the entire Civil War. This would in general correspond to a ratio of 120 to 1. And due to the increased use of explosives the proportionate consumption of nitrogen is still greater.

During the year 1918 we were consuming inorganic nitrogen in the United States at the rate of some 420,000 tons, and of this over 60 per cent was for strictly military purposes and over 75 per cent was imported in the form of sodium nitrate from far-away Chile.

It is, of course, difficult to forecast what our requirements for nitrogen for strictly military purposes will be, as they will in great measure depend upon the enemy or combinations of enemies that we are called upon to fight. But based upon the experiences of the past there is every reason to believe that future requirements in a major war effort will be materially greater than the already gigantic demand.

In this connection I also insert a letter from the Chief of Ordnance in answer to an inquiry by me as to specific nitrogen consumption in war:

MARCH 29, 1928.

Hon. JOHN J. MCSWAIN,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: In reply to your request for information regarding the consumption of powder by the American Army during the various wars in which we have participated, the records which we have available are limited to those covering the Revolutionary, Civil, and World Wars.

For the Revolutionary War the "History of the Explosive Industry in America" gives the total amount of black powder expended as 2,347,455 pounds.

For the Civil War, the report of the Chief of Ordnance for the year 1866 gives the expenditure of black powder for the period from January 1, 1861, to June 30, 1866, as 26,440,054 pounds.

For the World War, data are available showing the number of rounds of artillery ammunition by calibers expended by the American Expeditionary Forces in France. An approximate computation of the weight of propelling charges involved gives a total consumption of 29,569,081 pounds. In a like manner the quantity consumed during the battle of St. Mihiel is found to be 2,318,573 pounds.

The above computations do not include that powder consumed as a component of small-arms ammunition, but for the artillery ammunition are believed to be accurate within 5 per cent.

Sincerely,

C. C. WILLIAMS,
Major General, Chief of Ordnance.

SAVING IN FREIGHT CHARGES

I am informed by the Bureau of Economics that in 1924 the farmers of America paid $230,000,000 for commercial fertilizers. Since the consumption is on the increase constantly, I believe it is conservative to say that now the farmers are using at the rate of $250,000,000 worth per year.

The Interstate Commerce Commission reports that the average freight per ton of fertilizers is about $2.25. Furthermore, that during the year of 1927 the railroads hauled approximately 10,000,000 tons of fertilizers. That means that the sum of $22,500,000 was paid for freight on fertilizers, which means that approximately 10 per cent of the total value of fertilizers consists of freight. If by the shipment of concentrated fertilizers the volume and weight can be reduced by 75 per cent of the present volume and weight, and it is entirely reasonable to think and expect that such reduction may be made, then it is believed that by the use of concentrated fertilizers there may be saved to the farmers of America each year between $17,000,000 and $20,000,000 in freight charges alone.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMICS,
Washington, D. C., March 30, 1928.

Hon. JOHN J. MCSWAIN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: I herewith submit data confirming yesterday's telephone conversation with reference to fertilizer statistics. Over the telephone you were given the following:

Fertilizer expenditures in 1924 (census)		$230,000,000
Fertilizer tonnage originating on railways, 1926 (Interstate Commerce Commission)	tons	8,000,000
Fertilizer tonnage originating on railways, 1927 (Interstate Commerce Commission)	tons	10,000,000
Estimated freight revenue from fertilizer, 1923 (Interstate Commerce Commission)	per ton	$2.429

You may wish to relate the estimated freight revenue per ton to the 1923 tonnage. Tonnage originating on Class I railways in 1923 amounted to 7,640,000 tons, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Very truly yours,

LLOYD S. TENNY,
Chief of Bureau.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, as Madame Roland descended from the tumbrel on her way to the guillotine she exclaimed, as every schoolboy and schoolgirl knows, "O Liberty, how many crimes are committed in thy name!" And if the sincere, though misguided friends of agriculture continue their efforts to bestow privileges that the basic industry is not entitled to and which is denied to all other groups of American citizens, Ceres might well exclaim, "How many offenses are committed in my name!" What agriculture wants is a square deal, not favor. "Equal rights to all and special privilege to none" has been the cry of the tiller of the soil from the beginning of time. He has had to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow from the very dawn of history, and he thoroughly understands that he will have to do so until this earth ceases to be a habitation for man. He knows that all of the other groups are depending upon his industry; that he is an Atlas; that he supports the stupendous structure called cities, with their classes, masses, groups, and divisions. He knows that he will not only not gain anything by being looked upon as a Joseph with a coat of many colors, but that he will be placed at a tremendous disadvantage as a result of the mess of pottage that has not been asked for, but which has been thrust upon him.

The farmer is an American—first, last, and always. He does not want his Government in the business of making power and fertilizers and selling the same to the people through different channels. He knows that there is but one step from that venture to selling shoes, hats, and foodstuffs—which, of course, means "good night" to the Republic, individualism, and freedom. He does not want that under any circumstances; but his honest heart must revolt at the thought that as a necessary step to the Government going into business at Muscle Shoals in the way of making power and fertilizer and selling the same that it must crush out those that are engaged in the manufacture and sale of fertilizers particularly—thereby depriving them in the future of making a living and depreciating their property to such an extent that it might be deemed confiscation. I am surprised, my friends, that my own section of the country, the South, can even tolerate the idea of such a position in view of the historical background that such a pernicious expression of governmental tyranny and oppression must have for a people who were prostrated and their heads bowed in the dust as a result of a confiscatory policy on the part of the Federal Government which even under the war power was revolting to those that exercised it. No one born in the South but understands, believes, and knows that the South should have been compensated when emancipation was declared. Do not misunderstand me, Mr. Speaker. If I were living before the Civil War I would have been an abolitionist. But no man could be so prejudiced that has the slightest claim to intellectuality that does not admit that compensation is an obligation that rests upon everyone, sovereign and subject, when another man's property is taken even for a great public purpose. And yet I am compelled to admit that some of the finest men in the Southern States, men for whom I have an admiration and affection, are flatfootedly for this bill on the ground that the necessity of the occasion demands this action. I am against it—everlastingly and eternally against it—and what I consider the menacing policy which it expresses and which when fully developed means the destruction of the Republic. I am against it for the reasons that follow:

First. It creates the "Muscle Shoals corporation of the United States," providing definitely for 10 years of operation. This is long enough to cripple and largely destroy the present fertilizer industry, without setting up an equally efficient agency in its place.

Second. It turns over to this corporation without any charges whatsoever all of the Muscle Shoals properties which originally cost the taxpayers about $140,000,000. Private enterprise must pay in rentals, bond interest, or otherwise for all property it uses.

Third. It provides $10,000,000 of operating capital from the Public Treasury which shall be interest free during the first five years. The fertilizer industry must hire its moneys in the open market at the going rate of interest.

Fourth. It directs the corporation to manufacture not only nitrogen but complete fertilizers, authorizing purchase of the materials it does not make. This certainly is not in line either with the letter or the spirit of the national defense act of 1916, which provides for the production of nitrates for munitions of war and useful in manufacturing fertilizers and other useful products.

Fifth. It puts the Government in the fertilizer business from start to finish by requiring the corporation to sell at retail for cash, f. o. b. Muscle Shoals. This discriminates against poor and needy farmers in favor of those who can pay cash, and leaves a harvest of credit risks and bad debts for the remnant of private industry that must try to carry on because it has over $300,000,000 invested in the business.

Sixth. It prescribes that sales shall be made: (a) To farmers, farm groups, and farm organizations; (b) to States and State agencies for resale to farmers; and (c) to private manufacturers, mixers, and merchants of fertilizers after the foregoing preferred customers have been supplied. This is a gross discrimination, when fertilizers are only 9 per cent above prewar, and even farm products are 37 per cent above, against an industry that in one year created over $697,000,000 new wealth for an expenditure of $230,000,000.

Seventh. It authorizes the sale of surplus power. If this applied to all power produced it would be sound, because Muscle Shoals is recognized by all experts as primarily a power proposition.

Eighth. It requires sales of fertilizer to be at cost, with the income from sale of power to be subtracted from fertilizer manufacturing costs. This is robbing Peter to pay Paul. How could private enterprise possibly compete against such flagrantly subsidized competition? Is this fair?

Ninth. It authorizes the free distribution of 5 per cent of the total fertilizer production for "experimentation"; under certain conditions 15 per cent of the total production, whether nitrates or complete fertilizer, may be given away. Proper experimentation is desirable, but this provision would revive all the evils of free-seed distribution, only on a more vicious scale.

Tenth. It orders the corporation to build and operate superphosphate—acid phosphate—plants in the face of excess productive capacity now constructed. By the same reasoning it would be logical for the Government to open a huge new coal mine despite overproduction which is now strangling the coal industry.

Eleventh. It orders the immediate use of a nitrogen-fixation process that consumes over three times as much power per ton of nitrogen as modern plants now being constructed and operated in the United States. Instead of helping our infant nitrogen-fixation industry—now producing nitrogen equivalent to 700 tons of nitrate of soda daily—this proposal would confront it with subsidized governmental competition.

Twelfth. It authorizes copying and use of any private patents, thus discouraging further private research.

Thirteenth. It confers the right to condemn private property on a governmental corporation which is to compete with private enterprise.

Fourteenth. It provides that any person who for compensation of any kind enters into agreement of any kind with intent to defeat the purposes of the corporation shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than 15 years, or both. This is a dire threat against the fertilizer, power, or any other industry that may try to protect itself from the consequences of this incursion of the Government into private business.

Fifteenth. It gives fertilizer at a subsidized rate to farmers within normal shipping distance of Muscle Shoals, thus benefiting some farmers and discriminating against others. By giving fertilizer at subsidized prices to farmers of this area, it gives these farmers further advantage in competition with the southeastern cotton growers particularly would suffer in Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, where western competition has already been felt very keenly.

Sixteenth. It disrupts an industry that is giving good service to agriculture, with millions of satisfied customers who are getting fertilizer at prices relatively much lower than all other important supplies the farmer buys.

Despite the fact that this complete substitute for the Norris resolution, as passed by the Senate, is a new and distinctly different proposal from any other that has ever been before Congress dealing with Muscle Shoals, it was introduced by the Committee on Military Affairs without holding public hearings thereon.

Remember that Congress as a pure result of its parliamentary developments is a recognitory body. That is that ex necessitate it has to give recognition to committee findings as a general proposition. It is clear from this statement that committee must or should hold hearings which ought to be as full as possible and publish the same so that Members of Congress will know the reasons for the committee's report. This fundamental necessity of parliamentary procedure was not observed by the House committee, which did not hold hearings on the substitute bill which it reported out instead of the McNary bill. Sometimes an advertisement expresses so clearly, concisely, and convincingly a case that it is justifiable and sagacious to use it for its effectiveness.

ERADICATION OF PINK BOLLWORM

Mr. RAMSEYER, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following House resolution for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 193

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. J. Res. 129, to provide for eradication of pink bollworm, and authorizing an appropriation therefor. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

PERSONAL PHYSICIAN TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. RAMSEYER also presented the following resolution for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 192

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union S. 3456, allowing the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army, to the medical officer assigned to duty as personal physician to the President.

At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

SHOOTING OF JACOB D. HANSON

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes out of order, and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to inform the House concerning a most regrettable occurrence at Niagara Falls, in my district. On Saturday night there was a meeting of the Elks in that city, at which Mr. Hanson, one of the officers of the lodge of Elks, was present. After the meeting Mr. Hanson drove a fellow member to Lewiston and then late at night started home. At the foot of Lewiston Hill, in the morning, about 2 o'clock, he was ordered to stop by a man, who, I am told, was not in uniform, and upon his not obeying the order the person who commanded him to stop shot into the car.

The car proceeded up the hill and, apparently, signals were exchanged between the man at the foot of the hill and a man at the top of the hill, and a shot was fired at Mr. Hanson by the latter, inflicting a wound in the temple by which Mr. Hanson was rendered totally blind and from which he is now probably dying.

I understand these men were members of the Coast Guard, stationed at Youngstown, engaged in the prohibition enforcement service, but as I have already said, I am told they were not in uniform or, at any rate, were not wearing such uniform as in the darkness of the night would give notice to a man driving an automobile along the highway at a reasonable rate of speed that the person seeking to stop him was an official.

This incident has developed a very serious condition of affairs. Personally, I may say that about one year ago I had a similar experience and in the same vicinity, except that I was not shot. My wife and I were leaving the city of Niagara Falls for home about 10 o'clock at night and some one came out on the road in a lonely place, with woods at the side of the road, and signaled us to stop. We put on extra speed, and we passed the man who signaled us to stop without any deplorable incident.

But there should be some regulations, some rules, some control of these employees, so that the lives of citizens who are in the discharge of their daily duties and avocations and entitled to the enjoyment of their legal rights to travel the highways secure from assault shall not be subject to such deplorable results as befell Mr. Hanson.

It is not a question of being wet or dry. It is a question of protecting the ordinary citizen in his property and his life as he traverses the highways, which should be open and under protection to all. It is a serious question.

Immediately after this incident at Lewiston I took up the matter with the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. I said to him that this incident should be investigated thoroughly; that these men, if the facts are as reported, should be punished for such lawless and unjustifiable conduct, with the terrible consequences coming from it. I strongly urged that some rule should at once be put in force and observed which would protect the citizens on the public highway.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. May I have one minute more?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. At the proper time I shall ask that some action be taken by the House, referring an investigation of this matter to an appropriate committee, to see if Congress itself can not take some action to insure that the citizens on the highway are protected. As the matter is reported in the press, and by those living in the vicinity, there was no necessity or excuse for such a violent act, and under the circumstances and conditions present in this case, the citizen should be protected in his rights.

The case of Mr. Hansen has appealed to everyone living in the vicinity most strongly because he was a man of high character, well known both from his business connections and in his capacity as a popular and successful officer in the Elks Society, who was not in any way transgressing the law by transporting liquor or otherwise. The terrible injuries suffered by him have excited both sympathy and grief. The whole community, in fact, is aroused, and in speaking as I do, I believe that I am voicing their sentiments and feelings.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Does the gentleman know whether or not these men have been turned over to the prosecuting officers as yet?

Mr. DEMPSEY. My understanding is that at first the local officers refused to act, but that now they have acted.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman means the Coast Guard officers?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes. That information, however, is not official.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Does not the gentleman know that that is the usual rule?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one minute more. I wish to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Does not the gentleman know that there have been any number of these instances in New York where a Federal prohibition officer has committed murder, and the entire Department of Justice has put every obstacle in the way of his prosecution and have defended such men in the courts? This is only another instance of it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not know of the incident to which the gentleman refers. I only know of this incident, which occurred in my district. My county is a very large county, and all of our people are very deeply concerned and agitated over what is going to follow, whether the ordinary citizen is to be subjected to these dangers if he goes out on the highway at night.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does the gentleman care to tell the House what the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury says about it?

Mr. DEMPSEY. He said it would be investigated and every effort made to protect the citizens. [Applause.]

RETIREMENT OF EMERGENCY OFFICERS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial and letter:

[Editorial from Chicago Tribune, Thursday, May 3, 1928]

GENEROSITY FOR ALL VETERANS

The Tyson bill to grant retirement pay to disabled World War emergency officers has passed the Senate and is pending in the House. It has been unopposed except from one quarter. Retired enlisted men point to their own small pensions and ask that the Tyson bill be held up until they are granted increased compensation.

It is natural for the retired enlisted men to feel and to argue as they do. Their attack on the Tyson bill is, as they see it, their only chance to win a hearing.

Congress must decide both the Tyson bill and the claims of the enlisted men, and the way to do it is not to defeat the Tyson bill because the enlisted men are not receiving generous treatment, but to pass the Tyson bill and at the same time accord the enlisted men the recompense they deserve. The disabled emergency Army officer is the only one out of nine officer classes to have been left out. The members of the other eight classes have all been cared for by the Government. The Tyson bill, therefore, aims to right a real injustice.

The enlisted men will not be helped by the defeat of the Tyson bill; it will mean only injury to the emergency officers. Congress's duty is not a negative one—defeat of the Tyson bill—but a doubly positive one; passage of the Tyson bill and legislation in behalf of the retired enlisted man.

THE AMERICAN VETERANS OF ALL WARS,
Muskogee, Okla., May 5, 1928.

Subject: Tyson-Fitzgerald bill (S. 777).

Hon. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
House of Representatives, United States,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CARTWRIGHT: I wish to acknowledge with deep gratitude your valued letter of May 2. I have read with deep appreciation your statement, which I have ordered relayed to our whole and entire membership, and particularly to our members in the third congressional district, to wit:

"I went to Congressman FITZGERALD and offered my assistance, as you suggested. He seemed to appreciate it very much."

I am sure that not only has Mr. FITZGERALD appreciated it, but I will see to it that every ex-service man in the third congressional district, both appreciates and reciprocates a friendship and unselfish service of such nature.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT, the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill is a just bill. Those who are against the bill set up two objections to the bill. I fully believe that the opponents to the bill are as honest in their views as we who are fighting heart and soul for the bill are, but their arguments are groundless for the following reasons: It is stated by some that the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill is discriminatory, in that it discriminates in favor of the commissioned officer as against the enlisted man. This argument is without merit for the reason that it deals with a military establishment in a military organization. Rank is a reward for leadership, increased responsibility, and proportionate greater risk.

There is no discrimination against the enlisted man by giving the officer what is due his rank; remember, that from the beginning of time, when man established the safety of his own side, armies rewarded leadership with increased rank, which carried increased command, responsibility, and pay. Napoleon said, "Every soldier carried in his knapsack a field marshal's baton." The enlisted man of the last war may, with his training and experience, be the officer of the next war unless human nature should change and causes for war should cease and end, when there would be no war; hence what you would give to the disabled officer of the past war, you would or rather future Congresses would give to the disabled officer of the next war; where is the discrimination? Every commissioned officer has at all times been for the ex-soldier in all things that could be obtained for him; the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill is dealing with the officer; pass it just as it stands; do not kill it or endanger it by any amendments; pass it as the Senate has passed it; and if you and other Congressmen feel that the enlisted man should get more than he gets now, we are with you; tell us what Congress is willing to do for the enlisted man and we will do all in our power to help, but do not punish the most patriotic body of veterans—the disabled emergency officer—merely because Congress may feel that Congress has not done enough for the enlisted man. God bless you, bless Congress, and bless the enlisted man; he deserves everything that can be done for him, and I am daily doing it; this organization and every veteran organization is constantly doing this; tell us what more can we do, and we are ready, willing, and anxious to help the enlisted man at all times, but where is the discrimination?

Congress has a number of officials and employees; you pay them in different scales; is the fact that an employee with greater responsibilities, more serious duties, is getting more than one who has inferior duties or less influence to prepare himself a discrimination? Hardly. Why, then, raise the issue that an officer who has to prepare himself, take all risk, be responsible for the safety and well-being of his men, should be getting just a little higher pay than an enlisted man?

The opponents of the bill sing the praise of the enlisted man; no one knows him better than I do; thousands of the enlisted men know that I got up many a time from a sick bed, in cold winter nights, to go over the camp to see that my men were sleeping warm; the enlisted man has never done this for his officer; why? Because it was not his responsibility; if it was, God bless him, he would have done it. We had a great war, our Armies covered themselves with honor and glory, the enlisted man was worth in every way, but do not forget, it was an Army led by leaders, who were equal to their task. Why deny the officer what is justly due him? Are the opponents trying to eliminate leadership from our Army? Russian Soviets tried it, and even they gave it up. Why then not give the officer the tardy justice due him, and give him the same retirement rights which Congress has promised in 1917 when it needed the officer, and which Congress was generous enough to give to eight other classes of officers?

There is nothing to the claim that the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill discriminates against the enlisted men, our membership are mostly enlisted men and we are solid for the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill; other veterans organizations are similarly situated and are for the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill.

Again, opponents of the bill do not recollect, that during the war, we had one Army, the officer disabled in the World War, was an officer of the only Army the United States had at that time, and should be given as promised in the selective service act of May, 1917, the same treatment "In all respects upon the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army." Bearing in mind, that all distinction of armies was by War Department Order, No. 75, on August 17, 1918, abolished, in which it was stated:

"This country has but one Army, the United States Army, it includes all land forces in the services of the United States. These forces, however raised, lose their identity in that of the United States Army."

Where then is there any moral or sound reason for refusing to give the same treatment to one class of military officers than all other similar officers?

We had Regular officers, provisional officers, and emergency officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps at the beginning of the war. Later, by consolidating all the forces in one army, "the United States Army," all distinction has been abolished, all officers of the same ranks served side by side, carried out just as faithfully. Eight classes of the above officers—namely, the Regular, provisional, and emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps—have been given by Congress, and justly so, retirement rights they deserved and God bless Congress for doing so, but in the name of eternal right and justice, why not give the same to all? Congress has gone further, it has done justice to the naval and Marine Corps officer, it has done justice to what is known as the Regular Army officers, it has given retirement rights to the provisional Army officer; but to the man who has sacrificed most, to the man who has disrupted his whole life, and in many instances has never been able to regain the interrupted civilian career—the emergency officer—he, when equally disabled in line of duty, in the service of our beloved country, he (the disabled emergency officer) was neglected. He has been denied the same rights as has been generously and justly granted to the same officer who served side by side with him, except that the other officer had a commission reading provisional. There was no distinction in the right to serve and, if necessary, to die for our country. There should be no distinction in the right of the same type of officers to live for our country.

It has been my pleasure to discuss the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill with men and women of various thoughts, business, and professions. I have discussed it with legislators, merchants, ministers, lawyers, doctors, carpenters, tailors, blacksmiths, automobile mechanics, newspaper editors, and reporters, and all agree to the justice of treating the disabled emergency officer the same way as all other officers of the World War were treated; and I submit to you that 99.9 per cent of all our American people, of all ex-service men, and 100 per cent of all reputable and worth-while veteran organizations are for the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill.

There has never been a single measure before Congress which met with such universal approval; hence, there must be intrinsic value and merit in the same, and since it is a bill that affects us as taxpayers the fact that the taxpayers are heartily in favor of the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill should be the best argument for a speedy enactment of this bill into law; and in behalf of the disabled emergency officers, in behalf of all the faithful officers who have been disabled in line of duty, we hope and pray that the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill will pass overwhelmingly, and will promptly be approved by our great President, Calvin Coolidge, and will serve both as a just reward for faithful service of the past and as an encouragement for the future—that sacrifices honorably made for our country will not go forever forgotten by our Congress.

I shall appreciate for you to bring this earnest appeal in behalf of this just bill to the attention of all the Members of Congress.

Very cordially,

J. H. STOLPER,
General Counsel and Chairman National Executive Committee,
American Veterans of All Wars.

PRESERVATION OF A BATTLE SITE IN MONTANA

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8110, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8110. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8110) withdrawing from entry the northwest quarter, section 12, township 30 north, range 19 east, Montana meridian.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I remember that the Speaker the other day on a matter similar to this said he did not care to recognize a member of a committee in charge of a bill to take it up and agree to a Senate amendment unless the gentleman should show that he had the authority of the committee for such action. Therefore I want to ask the gentleman whether the committee has acted and authorized him to take this action.

Mr. LEAVITT. I had it up with the chairman of the Public Lands Committee——

Mr. GARNER of Texas. But the chairman is not the Committee on Public Lands. I think the ruling made by the Speaker was a good one, and when gentlemen want the House to agree to a Senate amendment they ought to call the committee together and get its permission to take that action. For the present I must insist that the rule the Speaker laid down, which is a good rule, be followed, and that the gentleman must get an authorization from the committee before asking the House to agree to a Senate amendment. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his request for the present.

Mr. LEAVITT. All this amendment does is to name the area——

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I do not care what it is. If the rule is to apply it must apply to all, however insignificant the amendment may be. I trust the gentleman will withdraw his request.

Mr. LEAVITT. I will be glad to withdraw it, under the circumstances.

RETIREMENT OF OFFICERS AND FORMER OFFICERS OF THE WORLD WAR

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill which has just been passed by the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I have received many communications both for and against this measure. Some from officers and some from enlisted men. Both during and since the World War I have voted for and supported every piece of legislation looking to the relief of the disabled Army officers, the enlisted men, and their dependents, and I would be glad to support any reasonable legislation favorable to the disabled emergency Army officer if I could do so consistently and in justice to the enlisted man.

This bill even discriminates against the officers. It is based upon rank. I see from the minority report that the bill favors 3,297 emergency officers whose disability is 30 per cent and above and will leave 6,972 emergency officers whose disabilities are less than 30 per cent upon the same basis of compensation as the enlisted men. It further appears from this report that there are 69,386 enlisted men who are disabled to the same degree as the 3,297 emergency officers who are to be benefited by this bill, and 173,842 whose disabilities are rated at less than 30 per cent permanent. It will also be noted that the bill makes no provision for the dependents of those officers who were killed, or who died in the service and since the war. These dependents will continue to draw compensation upon equality with the dependents of the privates. If we are to change our policy and base compensation upon rank, then should not the dependents as well as those living be cared for? The discrimination provided for in the bill is between emergency officers themselves and is enough to condemn the bill. Our Government and Constitution upon which it is based is designed to insure equality before the law.

Many of our young men entered the World War, some as privates and some as officers. They suffered the same sacrifices, encountered the same dangers and privations. The one common purpose was to serve their country. When the war ended they returned to civil life and were again placed on equality. Some of the privates were discharged from the service as disabled by reason of their military service. Some of the officers were in the same condition. Take for example two young men, one an officer and the other a private, discharged with the same disability. This bill provides for the payment of $30 for a 30 per cent disability to the private, and as much as $375 to the officer. This would be rank injustice, and for that reason I am opposed to the bill and shall vote against it.

I have a great sympathy for the disabled World War veteran whether he was an officer or a private, but I am unwilling to do more for one than for the other. The rank discrimination provided for in this measure is indefensible and unprecedented.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow it is expected to take up two bills the consideration of which is provided for in the two rules that were read from the Clerk's desk a few moments ago.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What are those bills?

Mr. TILSON. One is the pink bollworm bill—I think this is the short name for it—and the other is to give the pay and allowances of a colonel to a medical officer at the White House who happens to be of lower rank.

Mr. SNELL. It is a bill which applies to the personal physician to the President.

Mr. MICHENER. It applies to the man who now holds the position of physician to the President.

Mr. TILSON. It is general in its terms, I understand.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. No; it pertains to the man who is there now. It is a bill which is on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. TILSON. It is on the Union Calendar instead of the Private Calendar.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rules if he thinks it inadvisable to bring up to-morrow the rule which we reported out this morning relating to the Naval Committee bill?

Mr. SNELL. I will say to the gentleman that I am not quite ready to bring that up. I can not get the information necessary to bring that rule in.

Mr. TILSON. It is probable that the two bills first mentioned will take only a part of to-morrow. No general debate is provided for in one of the rules and only one hour of debate in the other rule.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the rule provide for no debate on one bill?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; no general debate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is a most unusual rule.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we shall probably have a few hours of extra time to-morrow, I ask unanimous consent that the Consent Calendar may be called, beginning at the point where we left off at the last call. The Consent Calendar is very much crowded now and should have consideration. Therefore, after the completion of the two small bills to-morrow, I should like to utilize the time in the consideration of the Consent Calendar.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Are you not giving undue preference to the Consent Calendar over the Private Calendar?

Mr. TILSON. The Consent Calendar has on it public bills, while the Private Calendar deals with private bills, and ordinarily we must give public business the right of way over Private Calendar business.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will all the time be used on the second bill so as to give us a chance to be ready on the Consent Calendar?

Mr. TILSON. I understand that the hour allowed will be taken on the one bill. The rule provides for one hour's general debate, and I understand all of it will be used, so that those who are studying bills on the Consent Calendar will have at least an hour after we meet to-morrow to study the bills.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he can give us any information as to when we will be given a hearing on the Boulder Canyon bill?

Mr. TILSON. The matter to which the gentleman refers is pending before the Rules Committee, and there has been no decision on the question, I believe. At least there has been no report from that committee.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HOLADAY. Under this unanimous-consent request we may be assured the Private Calendar will not be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. TILSON. There will be no Private Calendar business to-morrow if the Consent Calendar is taken up in accordance with my request.

I renew my request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Can not the gentleman give us some idea whether the Southwestern States can expect action at this session of Congress on the Colorado River matter?

Mr. TILSON. I can not. This is a matter which is pending before one of the committees of this House and I ought not to undertake to answer for a committee until the committee itself acts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, at the conclusion of the consideration of the two bills mentioned, it may be in order to consider bills on the Consent Calendar, beginning immediately followng the last bill considered on that calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CLAIMS OF NORTHWESTERN BANDS OF SHOSHONE INDIANS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 710) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, adjudicate, and render judgment in claims which the Northwestern Bands of Shoshone Indians may have against the United States, and ask unanimous consent that the conference report may be agreed to.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 710) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, adjudicate, and render judgment in claims which the northwestern bands of Shoshone Indians may have against the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, and 4, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the words "for the benefit of any" and before the words "of said Indians" insert the words "band or bands," so as to make the amendment read: "Any payment which may have been made by the United States, including gratuities for the benefit of any band or bands of said Indians or for their support and civilization, shall not operate as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as a set-off in said suit"; and the House agree to the same.

SCOTT LEAVITT,
W. H. SPROUL,
JOHN M. EVANS,
Managers on the part of the House.

LYNN J. FRAZIER,
THOS. D. SCHALL,
HENRY F. ASHURST,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The Senate has receded from its disagreement to the four amendments of the House with an amendment to the first House amendment by the inclusion of the words "band or bands" after the words "of any," so that the amendment will read: "Any payment which may have been made by the United States, including gratuities for the benefit of any band or bands of said Indians or for their support and civilization, shall not operate as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as a set-off in said suit."

Amendments 2, 3, and 4 are agreed to as they passed the House.

Amendment No. 2 limits the total attorneys' fees to $25,000. Amendment No. 3 makes the per cent of interest paid on proceeds of the suit 4 per cent instead of 5 per cent, this figure being in accordance with the usual practice in such cases. Amendment No. 4 limits the purposes for which the proceeds may be appropriated by Congress to health, education, and industrial advancement of the Indians involved.

SCOTT LEAVITT,
W. H. SPROUL,
JOHN M. EVANS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. It is not a question of objection. The gentleman has the right to call up the conference report.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the gentleman asked unanimous consent that it be agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I desire to make this statement: Conference reports are privileged matters, and therefore can be brought up practically at any time, but I think, in fairness to the Members of the House, Members who have conference reports to be considered should be here at the opening of the session and call up their reports at that time. I hope the chairmen of the several committees will bear this in mind, and if they have conference reports to be considered try to call them up at the time the House convenes, instead of at the time of adjournment.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. That has been my practice except in this case, where the Senate receded from its amendment and took the House's position, so that there was no controversy with regard to it.

Mr. TILSON. I say this in the interest of the convenience of Members of the House who wish to feel they can go away safely at the end of the afternoon without having as important matters as conference reports called up. I think it the better practice to call them up in accordance with their privileged status of the opening of the day's session.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

DREDGING OF MANHASSET BAY

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have here some resolutions passed by the town board of the town of North Hempstead, Nassau County, N. Y., relative to the importance of the dredging of Manhasset Bay. I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution of the town board, town of North Hempstead, Nassau County, N. Y.

Whereas the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, of Washington, D. C., now have under consideration the improvement of Manhasset Bay, in the town of North Hempstead, Nassau County, N. Y.; and

Whereas it is the belief and understanding of the citizens of our township that the members of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors are not sufficiently acquainted with the detailed facts regarding the importance of Manhasset Bay as a tidal waterway: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the town board of the town of North Hempstead does hereby authorize and direct the supervisors of said town to present the following facts regarding Manhasset Bay to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors:

1. The headwaters of Manhasset Bay include the exact geographical center of the town of North Hempstead, with an area of 54 square miles and a present population in excess of 50,000 people.

2. The present rate of growth of population in the town of North Hempstead would indicate that by the year 1950 the population will be not less than 300,000 people.

3. The maintenance of life and health of the residents of the town requires the importation of fuel each year in excess of the following amounts:

Fuel	Quantity	Retail value
Anthracite coal.....tons..	100,000	$1,400,000
Fuel and furnace oils.....gallons..	20,000,000	1,600,000
Total.....		3,000,000

4. The gas-engine driven motor vehicles owned and operated within the town number greater than 20,000 vehicles, and if they use an average of 5 gallons of gasoline per vehicle per day the daily consumption of the town is in excess of 100,000 gallons per day and has a retail value in excess of $20,000 per day, or $6,000,000 per year.

5. A study of costs indicates that the importation of anthracite coal and fuel oils by water transportation can be carried out at a saving of more than 5 per cent under the cost of transportation of such fuels by rail.

6. The shipments of large quantities of gasoline into our township by rail or motor truck provides a constant fire hazard to the lives and properties of our citizens, and gasoline and other highly inflammable liquids should be imported into our town by water from the manufacturing plants in the metropolitan territory which are all located on tidewater.

7. The headwaters of Manhasset Bay are the natural point of collection for the drainage of an area of the town exceeding 6 square miles. The reasonable future population of this area is placed at 30,000 people, who will account for a daily discharge of a total of 3,000,000 gallons of sanitary sewage into the headwaters of the bay. Treatment of such an amount of sewage, even in the most modern form of sewage-disposal plants, will not result in clean or potable water, and it is therefore necessary for the lives and health of the citizens of our town that wide and deep channels be maintained at the head of Manhasset Bay, so that the tidal flow of water may properly absorb and dilute the sanitary sewage discharge.

8. Road-building materials required in the construction and maintenance of State, county, town, and village highways are all manufactured on water-shipment points along the eastern seaboard, and are transported to Long Island by water. The present local costs of such materials are excessive, due to the shoal water conditions existing in the harbors of Nassau County, which prevent the entrance of full-barge load lots to the terminals, except at exact periods of high tides. The value of current importation of such materials into our township is in excess of $500,000 per year.

9. Portland cement, brick, terra-cotta tile, plaster, shingles, lumber, and other building materials are manufactured on tidewater points in the New York territory, or are brought to New York by water, and the transportation of same to our town should be by water, as there is a very considerable saving in such method of delivery due to the saving in cost of handling and reloading of such materials from barges and vessels at Brooklyn and Long Island City to railroad cars. The saving effected is practically the cost of the railroad freight from Long Island City or Brooklyn to the villages in our town. The value of building materials imported into our town each year is in excess of $5,000,000, and any reduction in handling costs results in a reduction of costs to our citizens.

10. Due to the fact that truck transportation of building materials from Brooklyn and Long Island City has proven more economical than rail transportation, the highways leading into the county of Nassau are daily congested with heavy-laden trucks, causing great congestion and delays in vehicular traffic and excessive costs of maintenance of highways. Water transportation of such materials will obviate this condition and lessen the necessity for future arterial highways.

11. There are 4 terminals operating at the head of Manhasset Bay, all of which are adequately equipped with unloading cranes and storage space to handle a large volume of fuel, road-building materials, building materials, etc., and there is sufficient water frontage to provide 10 such additional terminals, all of which will be required to handle the business of the future.

12. It is the opinion of this board that the immediate dredging of a ship channel to the present terminals at the head of Manhasset Bay of such length, width, and depth as to provide reasonable access to the said terminals by standard towing and transportation equipment can be done by the Federal forces for an expenditure not to exceed $100,000.

13. It is within the knowledge of this board that the Federal income taxes collected each year from the individual residents and corporations doing business within the town of North Hempstead is in excess of $2,000,000 per year, and its citizens are therefore large contributors to the Treasury of the United States.

14. It is the firm belief of the responsible citizenry of this town that both the present and future water-borne commerce of the town of North Hempstead and the county of Nassau demand that every possible improvement should be made to navigation conditions in Manhasset Bay and in Hempstead Harbor.

15. It is and has always been the policy of the officials of this town to plan and construct public improvements in advance of the acute needs for same by the public, and experience has shown that such a policy has resulted in obtaining public improvements at lower costs with greater convenience and benefit to the citizens of the town.

Acting with the knowledge that both the district engineer and the division engineer of the United States Corps of Army Engineers have made a careful economic survey of navigation conditions in Manhasset Bay and recommended the dredging of a channel through the headwaters of the bay, we hereby petition and request that the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors authorize the following work:

1. Removal of existing sand shoals and mud banks which are a menace to navigation conditions at the head of Manhasset Bay.

2. Construct and maintain a suitable channel to permit of easy access by tugs, scows, barges, schooners, etc., to the terminals at the head of the bay during periods of high and low water.

3. Installation and maintenance of buoys, channel marks, lights, etc.

4. The establishment of official bulkhead lines and issuance of instructions regarding construction of works outside of said bulkhead lines; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the following:

Noes: None.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal of said town this 9th day of May, 1928.

OFFICE OF THE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE OF THE FIRST NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS ON AGRICULTURAL TARIFFS,
Washington, D. C., May 11, 1928.

To Members of the Congress of the United States:

On May 7 and 8 at the Temple of Agriculture, 1731 I Street NW., in Washington, D. C., delegates from agricultural cooperative associations, representing 981,000 farmers, held their first national conference on agricultural tariff problems. That body created a special legislative committee on tariff, which was instructed to transmit to your honorable body the results of the deliberations of the conference.

The conclusions reached were as follows:

1. That these organized cooperatives indorse the principle of a protective tariff on all commodities coming into either direct or indirect competition with products produced on farms of the United States.

2. That Congress should levy a protective import duty on products from the Philippine Islands that come into either direct or indirect competition with products produced on the farms of the United States.

3. That the tariff act of 1922 needs drastic upward revision with respect to some commodities, a list of which is inclosed, in order to equalize more nearly the present disparity between the smaller share of the national income obtained by farmers and the larger share obtained by other groups within the United States.

4. That the present low economic state of our agriculture makes it a necessity for the Seventieth Congress in this session to pass emergency tariff legislation to aid our people.

To that end we ask you to give not only serious consideration to this form of agricultural relief, but also your assistance by passing this proposed legislation before another harvest season comes on. To do so will give a gleam of hope to farmers in many sections who now are suffering because of relatively low-priced farm products, caused in part by a huge volume of agricultural imports.

Respectfully yours,

THE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE OF THE FIRST NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON AGRICULTURAL TARIFFS, J. T. MONTGOMERY, Chairman,
Manager the Central Cooperative (Livestock) Association, South St. Paul, Minn.
CHAS. W. HOLMAN, Secretary,

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 13511) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. JONES. I submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes. I ask that the report be printed and lie on the table.

The report was ordered to be printed and lie on the table.

ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on unemployment delivered on May 8 of this year by Hon. James J. Davis, United States Secretary of Labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

UNEMPLOYMENT

To keep everyone employed is our noblest and most important duty. Unemployment is a grave danger to society. We all lose something when anyone loses a job. The jobless man loses his livelihood and society loses his productive and buying power.

Many of you who are listening in to-night like myself have known the misery of looking for the job that can not be found. As a steel worker I went through the unemployment crisis of 1892 to 1896, the worst period of unemployment this country has ever known. I knew the uneasiness of 1907, and the slack times of 1913 and 1914 just preceding the war. On assuming the office of Secretary of Labor in 1921 I ran into an unemployment crisis. The Senate at that time asked me to report on its extent, and the survey showed a shrinkage in employment, as shown by pay rolls, of 5,735,000 workers. Had we used the same method of computation that some alarmists are using to-day, the total of unemployment then might have been put at 10,000,000.

This year the Senate again asked for the figures on unemployment. It happens that the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which does this work in the Department of Labor, publishes every month the figures on employment, the cost of living, the rate of wages, and the like. But the Senate desired a special count, and a survey was made by the same experts who in 1921 found a shrinkage in pay rolls of 5,735,000. This year they found a shrinkage of 1,874,050.

These figures have been questioned as too conservative. Those who question them insist that shrinkage must run to twice or even four times this total. But the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which made this survey, is a body of experts. Its executive head is Mr. Ethelbert Stewart, a leading economist of the United States, with more than 40 years' experience in this statistical bureau. President Wilson advanced him from chief statistician to his present position, and President Harding and President Coolidge retained him in it. No one has ever questioned his honesty or accuracy. The bureau over which he presides keeps in touch with 10,772 manufacturing plants all over the United States. Its contacts with these key industries give it a broad guide to actual conditions.

In figuring the present state of employment the year 1925 was taken as a standard of comparison because it was a census year for manufacturing industries and this provided definite figures on the average or normal number at work. It meant a stiff comparison because 1925 was a good year. Labor was well employed. Wages were good. Saving deposits were large. Business as a whole was prosperous. Now as between the average of 1925 and January, 1928, the Bureau of Labor Statistics found a shrinkage of 1,874,050 in employment, and I stand squarely on those estimates. The estimate made by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in 1921 concerning the amount of unemployment was criticized by some as being too high. But that estimate stood the test, and the estimate made this spring by Commissioner Stewart will do likewise.

I believe there is no attempt to discredit the estimate given by the statistical bureau. It is simply a question of how the figures shall be interpreted. In the eyes of one critic, the figures are right if interpreted his way. He thinks they point to a still larger amount of unemployment. Still another critic believes the employment shrinkage is four times the findings of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The most extravagant attempt of all has been to link the bureau's findings with the year 1920. That was during a period of high wages and of patriotic appeal to all workers to go into the factories and "produce goods for starving Europe." In 1919 and 1920 women and girls who never had worked before took temporary employment. On the other hand the year 1921 was one of sudden and acute depression, with unemployment. If you took that year as a basis of comparison, it would be possible to show more people at work to-day than ever were before—with but one single exception—1920.

The normal year of 1925 shows what I think is absolutely correct, that we have to-day 1,874,050 fewer people on the pay rolls. After having read the estimate by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, a distinguished critic wanted to know, "Why the extra fifty?" As a matter of fact, if that man will stop talking long enough to find jobs for those 50 workers represented by the number mentioned, we will gladly take it from the sum total.

The fact is, if you take into account what this country has lately been through, the wonder is that we have not had an economic catastrophe. Even under the restrictive immigration law we admit nearly 300,000 immigrant aliens every year. In view of the quota law, many of my hearers may well inquire, "How can this be when the total quota fixed by law is 165,000 annually?" But this quota applies to Europe and does not apply to Canada, Mexico, and the other independent countries of the Western Hemisphere. Anyone who can pass the literacy tests from these countries may enter the United States. As I have repeatedly stated, "We have closed the front door and left open the back door." Since 1925 more than a million immigrants have come to us. Every year one of our southern neighbors sends to us about 70,000 people, most of them common laborers, the hardest of all to fit into jobs. And with improved machinery in our factories and on our farms, it is going to be still harder to find places for the common labor already here. Every year 250,000 people leave the farms to seek work in the cities. Since 1925 nearly three-quarters of a million of these have thus joined the ranks of the job hunters. Every year nearly 2,000,000 boys and girls attain the age of employment. Of course, we must take into account the fact that many of these took the places of those who had passed from life or beyond the age of employment. But there still remains an annual increase of many millions of workers to be absorbed.

Against this increase in the number of workers we have had unusually heavy economic blows since 1925—the floods in the Mississippi Valley and in New England, the Florida tornado, a serious disturbance of more than a year's duration in the soft-coal industry, and the temporary closing of the largest single motor industry for readjustment. And as a consequence we have had a business recession, though comparatively slight and passing.

On top of this, new automatic machinery is steadily displacing hand labor. New scientific management methods and labor-saving devices enable many industries to turn out a greater production than ever, with fewer workers than ever. To cite a single instance, the railroads to-day are handling a record tonnage of freight with vastly fewer men. The same process is going on in every industry. And the jobs thus wiped out are gone forever.

To my mind it is a proof of our wonderful vitality as a Nation that we have been able to meet these rapid and sweeping industrial changes with as little unemployment as we have. In all fairness to the people of this country who want to see business prosper—in all fairness to the workers, skilled and unskilled, who are temporarily unemployed—it seems to me that the tactics of those who exaggerate a present condition that is serious enough, only tend to increase the general uneasiness and slow up the return to better times with reemployment for all. Calamity howling only creates calamity. Sometimes, too, the unwise and unscrupulous employer takes advantage of the situation thus created to reduce wages. Such employers have no thought for the permanent prosperity of our people. They are wholly selfish.

As it is the natural course of events is improving the situation every day. While it seems that because of a backward spring April will not show any great improvement, I am confident that May will show a substantial improvement in practically all lines of industry and agriculture. Seasonal work will pick up in May and will increase the number of workers and the total of pay-roll disbursements. The advancing season will open the farms to the 600,000 workers annually employed in growing and harvesting the crops. Building and other outdoor trades will likewise take on greater activity. States, municipalities, and the National Government all have elaborate building and construction programs that will absorb a large percentage of the unemployed, most of whom are what is called "common labor."

The proposal that Government work be launched in times of depression to aid the situation is not a new one. That has been the recommendation by all "employment conferences." The Bureau of Labor Statistics showed a decline in employment throughout 1927 and the United States Government has recognized it by its approval of a large construction program throughout the country and the District of Columbia.

The Government has appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars to carry on the work. The Treasury Department informs me that everything possible is being done to hasten work on these projects. The one motor industry long suspended for readjustment is returning to normal activity. And before long some plan for flood prevention will add to all these other demands for labor.

Forward-looking business men themselves are beginning to tackle the unemployment problem from their own practical angle. They know that people out of work can buy no products. They know that in order to be fully prosperous the country must keep at work every person in need of a job, all earning wages and provided with purchasing power. They know that the more buyers we have, the greater the demand for products in general. The greater the demand, the greater the demand for workers to keep the market supplied, with greater profits to business in general.

One of the greatest employers of labor in our country has evolved a plan whereby men engaged in continuous operations, who have always worked a seven-day week, are under a new arrangement given a six-day week on seven days' pay. This has made room for additional workers who also work a six-day week on seven days' pay. That one act put 20 per cent more men to work in a single operation. It is one fine way to reduce unemployment. As this particular company's scientific methods are good ones, its competitors already are trying this way of absorbing workers, and the method will spread. It seems to me one of the revolutionary moves in modern industry. It not only relieves temporary unemployment, but strikes at the great ideal of preventing unemployment altogether. Above all, it wipes out the seven-day week, a practice it is time to abolish.

Unemployment is a world problem. Other countries have tried treating the festering sore with surface poultices—government doles and the like. The thing to be done is to get to the roots of unemployment and wipe it out altogether. That is the greatest economic problem of our time. The best brains in government, business, and science will be needed to solve it. But if this richest country of all does not soon apply itself to the problem, our discontented jobless may force us into the same paternalistic experiments now costing other countries so much.

History teaches that unemployment has often led to revolution. Education has taken us out of that danger. But it has brought us face to face with new possibilities. The man or woman out of work and truly desirous of employment need no longer resort to violence. Neither will they steal or starve. Education and the ballot have given them new ways of striking back. They will arouse public opinion and put through special legislation.

If we are to go on firing good employees at 50, and allowing skilled workers to be displaced in thousands by new labor-saving machinery, without practical efforts to reabsorb these people in new pursuits, they will eventually appeal for special legislation to take care of them at public expense. Special legislation has already been passed by Congress, and if such legislation can be passed for one class it can for another.

It would be deplorable if this grave and deeply human problem of unemployment is to be made a political football. We ought to grasp this nettle not as partisans but as Americans and practical economists. Those who would make it a political issue are only playing into the hands of the party and the administration they seek to belittle.

The party to which I belong came into office at the end of a former opposition administration that left behind it nearly 6,000,000 of unemployed. Under the present administration these millions were put back to work. Under the Presidency of Calvin Coolidge this country has further absorbed all but a fraction of the millions who have come into labor's ranks from the farms and through immigration growth. In spite of sweeping advances in business method and labor-saving machinery it has kept at work nearly all of the workers. That feat of construction and reconstruction speaks for itself.

Not only this, but under President Coolidge the United States has become the most prosperous country of to-day and of all time. We Americans do not need to say this ourselves. All the rest of the world says it for us. And as good Americans it seems to me we should give up disturbing this state of affairs and instead do everything within our power to keep our country prosperous so that everyone who desires to do so may be steadily employed and at good wages. That I know is the ambition of President Coolidge and all who are connected with his administration.

ADDRESS BY EDWIN B. PARKER

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, during the World War Judge Edwin B. Parker, whose home is in Houston, Tex., was a member of the War Industries Board and priorities commissioner. After the signing of the armistice he went to Europe as chairman of the United States Liquidation Commission, of which Vice President Dawes was a member, and which disposed of all American surplus war materials in Europe and settled all claims between the United States and its allies in the short period of 10 months. Subsequently he has been serving as a member and as umpire of several international arbitral tribunals, which tasks he has discharged in a manner to inspire the confidence of nations and promote the cause of international arbitration. He has now entered upon his duties as war-claims arbiter under the settlement of war claims act of 1928, recently passed by Congress.

On the 7th instant Judge Parker, as chairman of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, delivered a very remarkable and philosophic address, sounding the keynote of the sixteenth annual meeting of that organization. It is one of the finest things of the kind I have ever had the pleasure of reading. I ask that it may be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD, together with a resolution passed by the board.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address and resolution are as follows:

TEAMWORK FOR PROSPERITY

THE KEYNOTE

"Business repudiates those whose ruthless methods tend to discredit all business and reaffirms its allegiance to those sound principles of conduct which beget confidence, upon which to endure all business must rest."

"We pledge ourselves to team play with every element of the community of which we are a part to achieve an all-embracing prosperity, inclusive of all groups and all classes."

"We dedicate anew our best efforts to the diligent pursuit of the greatest of all vocations—the business of right living—proclaiming to the world that he who would be great among us must become the servant of all."

(An address by Edwin B. Parker, chairman of the board of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, at the sixteenth annual meeting, Washington, D. C., May 8, 1928)

TEAMWORK FOR PROSPERITY

For many years and under varying circumstances and conditions, in peace and in war, in prosperity and in adversity, it has been my privilege to have close contacts with those engaged in all classes of business activities, and thus I have acquired an accurate understanding of the problems and the aspirations of the average American business man. The message which I bring to you to-day flows from these sources of information and understanding. It is not, in any proper sense, my message. I am simply the agency to interpret and the mouthpiece to express, with the utmost frankness and earnestness, this composite message of the average business man dealing with some of the fundamentals of prosperity.

This, the sixteenth annual meeting of the federation of American business, has for its underlying theme and will sound as its keynote "Teamwork for prosperity."

Let us at the outset place the emphasis on "teamwork." If it is broad and general, prosperity will follow. Thus conceived, this keynote is a bugle call to duty. It envisions vast vistas of enduring usefulness.

Narrowly conceived, it is paltry and sordid.

We are not here to consider a teamwork between members of a particular group; to promote a prosperity, measured solely in terms of profit to the members of that group, without thought of the interests and the welfare of every individual of every group within our Nation. Such is the miser's conception of prosperity—coldly, selfishly, narrowly calculating; a precarious prosperity because of its very narrowness. Prosperity to endure, prosperity to be worthy of the effort to attain it, prosperity as we here conceive it, is an all-embracing prosperity.

To achieve such a prosperity we invoke a teamwork that is not merely a cohesion of members within a business group, or yet a cohesion of business men with business men. It is rather a broader teamwork; an all-embracing cohesion whose bonds of unity are the tendrils of enlightened self-interest, which is mutual interest and common understanding of common purposes; teamwork between business and labor; teamwork of business and labor with agriculture; teamwork of business and labor and agriculture with Government, the servant of all; a teamwork that translates and gives dynamic effort to the professed conviction of this chamber that whatsoever is not for the public good is not for the good of business. A teamwork, in fine, whose inspiration is the fostering of the general public interest rather than that of one or of a group of special interests.

Teamwork is not new to business. Business has a tradition, through teamwork, for pointing the way to higher concepts of the public interest. The tradition goes back a long way. In the early part of the ninth century Charlemagne recognized the "ancient custom of commerce" as something definite that had been created by the merchants themselves, and something conferring advantages to which other classes had not yet attained. In the general insecurity and lawlessness that prevailed in the early part of the Middle Ages the merchants—the business men of the day—organized for their own protection, and to govern their transactions developed principles which were far in advance of the principles of the laws of their times, and provided their own tribunals, where these principles could be equitably and promptly applied. At a time when legal proceedings were notoriously dilatory and technical and where obligations were enforceable only when embodied in formidable documents of great artificiality business men evolved the law merchant and themselves so administered it that an English judge of the eighteenth century referred to it as "a system of equity founded upon rules of equity and governed in all its parts by plain justice and good faith." What higher tribute could be paid any body of men with respect to their intertrade relations?

Business to-day is profiting by the example set by the merchants of the Middle Ages, and transactions involving billions of dollars annually in our own country occur under conditions of self-government in business prompted by the dictates of "plain justice and good faith." Statutory fiat has never created a single great modern market nor originated the facilities that have made such markets possible.

The growth and development of business and the progress and well-being of society as a whole demand unhampered opportunities for individual effort and initiative, which is rendered increasingly difficult in proportion to the increase in Government regulation of business. On the other hand, methods and practices designed to secure immediate gains, without reference to the effect on the general public or the ultimate effect on business itself, sometimes render restrictive and regulatory legislation in the public interest imperative. Business chafes under such legislation. The remedy lies in its own hands. It can, if it will, be governed and regulated by its own rules and principles of business conduct enforced by the most effective of all sanctions—a wholesome public opinion—created and fostered by business itself.

At its annual meeting held four years ago this chamber, in adopting 15 fundamental principles of business conduct, committed itself to self-regulation by business in these words:

"Business should render restrictive legislation unnecessary through so conducting itself as to deserve and inspire public confidence."

This is not a mere phrase, not a mere grouping of platitudinous words expressing pious protestations intended for public consumption but not for practical application. I am convinced that the great masses of successful business men who have adopted as their own this principle of business conduct have done so in the utmost good faith, with the fixed purpose not to stop at subscribing to it but of living it, realizing that it is fundamental to enduring prosperity in business.

Another principle of business conduct, then adopted by this chamber and subsequently by local chambers, trade associations, firms, and individuals throughout the Nation, runs thus:

"The foundation of business is confidence, which springs from integrity, fair dealing, efficient service, and mutual benefit."

And going a step further this Federation of American Business said:

"The function of business is to provide for the material needs of mankind, and to increase the wealth of the world and the value and happiness of life. In order to perform its function it must offer a sufficient opportunity for gain to compensate individuals who assume its risks, but the motives which lead individuals to engage in business are not to be confused with the function of business itself. When business enterprise is successfully carried on with constant and efficient endeavor to reduce the cost of production and distribution, to improve the quality of its products, and to give fair treatment to customers, capital, management, and labor, it renders public service of the highest value."

In adopting these principles American business professed its belief that "the expressions of principles drawn from these fundamental truths will furnish practical guides for the conduct of business as a whole and for each individual enterprise."

These are high professions of strong, farsighted, earnest men. That they then expressed, and increasingly continue to express the firm convictions of the great body of successful business men of this Nation, there can be no doubt. But when we are considering teamwork it is profitable to recall the fundamental rules of the game, which should govern the team irrespective of the numerous elements in its composition.

Business does not exist unto itself alone. Business exists only by reason of what it does for others. It finds its opportunities to continue and to develop only in advancing the welfare and the happiness of all those from whom it buys, those to whom it sells, and those whom it employs. In the final analysis business deals with human welfare and human happiness. Its function is to find ways of promoting human welfare and of adding to the opportunities for human happiness. Without teamwork that function can not be successfully performed.

In its true significance teamwork among business men contemplates that each man so pursue the task he has set for himself that he will progress by virtue of his own abilities, of his own skill, of his own diligence rather than through placing impediments in the way of others. This principle of business conduct has been proclaimed by this chamber in these words:

"Unfair competition, embracing all acts characterized by bad faith, deception, fraud, or oppression, including commercial bribery, is wasteful, despicable, and a public wrong. Business will rely for its success on the excellence of its own service."

While this is a simple formula, it is not so simple that it operates automatically. There must be teamwork to insure its observance.

Business performs its function by seeking out new methods to reduce costs, by developing new products of ever-increasing utility in commodities and services, and by evolving new methods to advance the common welfare. It is peering into the future, making forecasts of conditions in months and years to come, and backing its forecasts with all it possesses. It does not pause to philosophize about the future; it gathers all that philosophy can offer, all that science can give, compounds everything it can garner from every source, however humble, with all the hard facts of daily experience; and, basing its conclusions upon the product, it acts. Thinking little of the past, scarcely taking note of the present, it is intent upon the future into which it projects itself. That it may gauge the future correctly, it requires more than the cooperation of the public—it must have the confidence of the public. Any disturbance of that confidence, any detriment suffered by the public which will cause a moment's hesitation in the free bestowal of that confidence, withdraws from business the foundation upon which its future must rest.

The times demand straight thinking and frank speaking. They demand that we consider the disturbing evidences of a business atavism, of a throwback to a day of unrestrained individualism; a day of "the public be damned," when men of great business ability with an eye single to their own selfish interest and immediate returns, and without regard to the future, ruthlessly pursued their predatory lusts in a spirit of "after me the deluge!"

The recent conspicuous examples of individuals, prominent in big business, becoming intoxicated with power and involved in transactions tainted with fraud and corruption, violating every principle of sound business conduct, holding themselves above the law, are not peculiar to this day nor to the profession of business. Every generation, every profession, has its unfaithful members. But business, which has lately been defined as "the oldest of the arts and the newest of the professions," must, in order to maintain its professional status and to reap the unquestioned advantages of group action, scrupulously discharge its group responsibilities.

Among these responsibilities is to see to it that the profession of business is purged of those pirates whose acts stigmatize and bring business generally into disrepute. Such individuals, unmindful of their duties to the public, inevitably bring upon themselves and the entire institution of business the thunderbolts of public wrath in terms of legislative and governmental regulation that hamper a legitimate freedom of initiative. Ruthless and selfish initiative must be curbed in the public interest and in the interest of legitimate business.

Just as nations will decline to recognize, as a member of the family of nations, a government committed to destroying the foundations of our civilization; just as the legal profession has taken measures for disciplining and disbarring the "shyster"; just as the medical profession purges itself of the unethical practitioner, so business will decline to recognize as a member of the profession of business, and trade associations will decline to receive into their ranks, or will expel, an individual or an organization that willfully violates the fundamental principles upon which sound business rests, or that persists in ignoring the decencies of business intercourse, and besmatters all business with the slime of corruption or with the muck of unclean practices.

Shall the business community as a whole lose the ground that it has painstakingly and deservedly gained in order that a few—a very few in relation to the vast host engaged in American business—a few who hold themselves above the law, may crash through and demolish the canons of sound business practices? Those canons have been set up by organized business for its self-government, not only for its own protection, but as an assurance to the public that business may be trusted to formulate and enforce its own rules of fair play—its rules of good sportsmanship—and to do and do thoroughly its own housecleaning. If organized business is content to sit supinely by and permit the ruthless few to undermine the sound foundation on which it rests, then indeed does business richly deserve that swift manifestation of public indignation that will surely be visited upon it.

Much has been said and written of late of the betrayal of public trusts by those in high places. All such must be dealt with by the courts and by the voters to whom they are accountable. I have neither the time nor the disposition to deal with them here. The present concern of business is to cast the beam out of its own eye; to purge itself of those corrupters of public servants whose moral turpitude in making possible the betrayal of a public trust is even greater than that of those whom they would debauch; and to put the ban of outlawry upon those who have a contempt for the public interest, those who have a contempt for the government that affords protection to them and to their property, and those who have a contempt for our institutions of justice. Organized business will have the courage and the sound judgment to cast out these defilers of the institution of business both in its own interest and in the interest of the public, which in turn will be quick to brand the offenders with the contempt which they richly deserve.

Leaving all public agents entirely out of the picture, and dealing solely with the shortcomings of its own members, business is here concerned with purging its profession not only of the principal offenders, but of those accessories, either before or after the fact, who, unmindful of the public interest involved and of their duties to the public, are guilty of a suppression of the truth which the public has a right to know.

It is the function of government to deal with crime. But there is a twilight zone between acts which are illegal and criminal on the one hand and acts which are simply unmoral on the other. Those whose conduct falls within this zone, whose acts, while within the law, are repugnant to the public interest, must be branded as social outlaws.

We are here concerned in awakening the seemingly dormant business consciences of many of the stockholders of corporations who, through nonaction, impliedly place the seal of their approval on the acts of their offending agents. All such owe it to themselves, to the profession of business, and to the Government, publicly to repudiate those who misrepresent them. They can not accept the profits flowing from corruption and escape the moral stigma which inheres in such profits. Neither can they permit those who act for them to profit personally through corrupt corporate transactions or shield others who do.

May I remind you that another one of your principles of business conduct provides that—

"Corporate forms do not absolve from or alter the moral obligations of individuals."

Let me also remind you that an established corporation has a personality all its own. It possesses character and individuality. It is a composite of the individuals, whatever their rank or station, who control, direct, or manage it. The character they stamp upon it, the color and form they give it, the life, the force, the spirit they breathe into it—these constitute its soul. Individual responsibility is not lost through corporate action but, on the contrary, is increased in exactly the ratio that the influence exerted through corporate action exceeds that of independent individual action. An enlightened self-interest will prompt the great body of stockholders to delegate responsibilities only to men who realize that while acting in a representative capacity they owe obligations not only to their stockholders but to others—to employees, to the public which they serve, and even to their competitors—which obligations, neither they nor their stockholders can escape through the creation of the legal fiction of an artificial person.

We are concerned in pointing out to the millions of corporate stockholders throughout the land that it is far more important to the permanent success of the institutions in which they have invested that these institutions be managed and directed by clean, upright, just, and able men than that their profits should be abnormally increased.

This chamber is committed to the principle that Government should not enter the realm of business to undertake that which can be successfully performed in the public interest by private enterprise. This principle is politically and economically sound. We are here concerned in pointing out to business men everywhere that this principle is in far less danger from the propaganda of radical agitators than from the members of the business profession who are faithless to their obligations, who break down public confidence, and who provoke Government regulation.

Congressional investigations of particular business activities are sometimes bitterly denounced. Many congressional investigations are of the highest value to the public, including business. The demoralization to legitimate business that sometimes follows in their wake can be largely avoided by organized business doing its own investigating and frankly and fully laying all pertinent facts pertaining to any business affected with a public interest before the tribunal of public opinion. A business which can not stand this acid test is not entitled to prosper. The public, which is entitled to know the facts, will be satisfied with nothing less. Organized business should itself perform this task in its own and in the public interest. Failing to do so, Congress should and will act.

This chamber—the federation of American business—is vitally interested in promoting sound trade but not directly interested in promoting the fortunes of any trader. With an organization membership of more than 1,500 chambers of commerce and trade associations, and an underlying membership of nearly a million business men, its concern is not with any particular business or group of businesses or with any special interest but with business as a whole. Therefore, it is deeply concerned in preventing any special interest taking an unfair advantage of or collecting an undue profit from business as a whole. It is deeply concerned in ascertaining to what extent there is danger of pooled capital—in the form of an artificial person, clothed by law with the corporate power to engage in every activity in which an individual could engage, of obtaining a strangle hold on the homes, the workshops, the businesses, the communities, and ultimately on the Government of the Nation.

During the World War we had an ugly but expressive word for those who sought to evade the duty the emergency laid upon every citizen. We called them "slackers." Public opinion was swift and sure in its condemnation of them.

"Slacking" did not end with the war. Every member of the profession of business who fails to observe the canons of decency and fair play and good sportsmanship, or everyone who, living up to those canons himself, lacks the courage to speak out in condemnation against that minority which brings business into disrepute, is "slacking" in his duty—in his duty to himself, in his duty to business, and in his duty to the public. And organized business, if it is to continue to deserve public confidence, must brand such "slackers" business outlaws.

As I have indicated, the only prosperity which will endure is a general and an all-embracing prosperity, and the teamwork to achieve it must be a general and all-embracing teamwork between business and labor.

The application of scientific principles to the technique of production and distribution has enormously increased volume and reduced costs. There is every reason to believe that the use of mechanical labor-saving devices will increase progressively, with a constantly decreasing number of employees per unit of production and distribution. The labor released must find, and to a great extent has been able to find, employment by supplying the ever-increasing demands of the constantly rising standards of living.

But much of this released labor can not in the nature of things create its own employment. This is a task for the business engineer, for the enlightened self-interest of business demands that our population have the opportunity for steady and gainful employment. Business can not stop to contemplate with satisfaction the products of its invention, but must press forward to provide for the victims of its invention. Progress means improvements on systems which were impossible to previous generations, and these improvements, in turn, stand in peril of being wrecked by other improvements. It is the task of the business engineer, while pressing on and occupying higher and higher ground in the economy of business, to see to it that he does not leave behind the mangled bodies of those who have made his ascent possible.

The production by labor to the limit of its ability to produce increases the wealth of the world, correspondingly raises standards of living, and adds to consuming power. To the extent that consumption is increased production and distribution must be enlarged, which in turn contributes to the prosperity of business.

But labor can prosper only through gainful employment—steady employment. Irregularity in employment entails not only individual loss and human suffering but economic waste, which works directly to the disadvantage of business as a whole. Here is a problem which calls for the maximum of teamwork between business and labor. It is a challenge to the resourcefulness of the business engineer that production and distribution which have been considered as seasonal be made continuous throughout the year, so that seasonal unemployment with its inexcusable waste and suffering may be relegated to the past.

Business will continue to grow and to prosper and to endure so long, but only so long, as it mounts on its yesterdays as stepping stones to higher things; not on the backs of labor, staggering under the load, robbed of the opportunity of honest and continuous employment, a victim of that progress which would otherwise glorify our generation. Be it said to the everlasting credit of the business engineer that he has accepted the imperious challenge to correlate and harmonize the conflicting forces in commerce, trade, and industry, and will not stop short of providing steady and gainful employment to all seeking it, including those who have been dislocated by the march of progress. Here is presented an opportunity for teamwork between business and labor calculated to produce the maximum of satisfaction and the most enduring prosperity.

There is a German proverb to the effect that when the farmer is prosperous, prosperity is general. Whether this be economically sound or not, certain it is that when the farmer is not prosperous his curtailed buying power adversely affects every class of business. The idea that there is an irreconcilable conflict between the interests of the farmer and that of organized business has been exploded. Waste-breeding war between these two great forces in our national economy is being superseded by productive cooperation and teamwork, increasing the prosperity of both.

We hear so much of the problems of agriculture. There are many agricultural problems, and they vary just as the soil, the climate, the geographical location, the transportation facilities, and numerous other factors affecting agriculture vary from one locality to another. When collectively these many problems affect adversely large agricultural populations throughout the Nation, we have a national problem.

It is the duty and privilege of business men everywhere methodically, systematically, and whole-heartedly to cooperate with organized and unorganized farmers and to assist in finding sound solutions for their problems. In this undertaking the local chambers of commerce already are playing and will continue to play an ever-increasing part, and the national chamber, with the data and material which it has assembled and other information which it has within its reach, is not only willing but anxious to do its full share toward promoting general prosperity through systematically and sympathetically contributing toward solving the many problems of agriculture.

Reference has heretofore been made to a fundamental principle of this chamber—that government should scrupulously refrain from entering any of the fields of industry, commerce, transportation, or distribution, or any phase of business that can be successfully undertaken in the public interest by private enterprise. Firm in that faith this federation of American business stands to-day. But this principle, sanctioned alike by American political tradition and sound economics, in no whit abridges the right and the duty of government to conserve the larger public interest with respect to those private enterprises that are impressed with a public interest. Indeed, this chamber, which is not an organization of "big business," but is a big organization of all business, is profoundly interested in the proper function of government in the legitimate regulation of those private enterprises impressed with a public interest, for experience demonstrates that wholly unhampered and unchecked private initiative may become destructive of the welfare of business as a whole.

Business believes in wholesome competition, but competition is not primitive strife. Business knows that competition may become not the life of trade but in truth the death of the traders. Piracy masquerading as competition is piracy none the less. Ruthless and unbridled individual initiative must be curbed in the public interest, and such legitimate checks and curbs are a proper exercise of the function of government. But business insists that this function be so exercised as neither to become burdensome as to costs nor to paralyze that constructive initiative which is the mainspring of American business.

In this nice balancing of their respective functions is an opportunty for enlightened teamwork between government and business.

In the progress which business has made through trade association activities and otherwise toward organized self-regulation, government is playing, and will increasingly play, an important part. Business can and is prepared in effect to legislate for itself in eliminating unfair, uneconomic, and wasteful trade practices, including all forms of unfair competition. Chief among these are commercial bribery to secure competitive business, the misrepresentation of wares through misbranding or otherwise, the deformation of credit, enticement of employees, the use of financial strength to drive competitors from the market, or any action of any nature whatsoever opposed to good morals because characterized by bad faith, deception, fraud, or oppression. While business men, out of their intimate knowledge and experience of conditions and practices obtaining in their particular trade, are increasingly demonstrating that they have both the foresight and the courage necessary for self-regulation, nevertheless business lacks both the machinery and the power to enforce, save through moral suasion, those rules of self-restraint which it may promulgate in its own and the public interest and discipline such members of a group as may transgress those rules. When the appropriate Government agency has, after full hearing, approved such rules as in the public interest they can and will be enforced.

But in its own interest business, in its self-regulating activities, must be careful not to lean too heavily on government. When a majority of the real leaders in business are not only willing themselves to eliminate unfair trade practices but insist that all members of their group do the same or be branded as "slackers" not only because it pays but because it is right, the effect of their moral influence will leave comparatively little for Government agencies to do.

Trade and the individual trader can not afford to forget that the giver of commercial bribe, as well as the giver of a political bribe, is more despicable than is the debauched recipient. The plea that competition forces the adoption of this and other unfair trade practices can no longer be sustained in view of the ever-increasing success of the experiment of self-regulation by organized business with the cooperation of government. Here team play between members of a trade in cooperation with government furnishes a clean and effective way out. Moreover, such a plea, quite apart from its moral aspect, is economically unsound; for, while a business adopting unfair methods of competition may temporarily prosper, it can not long endure.

This chamber, as the mouthpiece of organized business, is clothed with the duty of assembling and presenting to legislative and other governmental agencies data and information helpful to the Government in applying the principles enunciated through referenda or resolution by the chamber's members. In so doing, organized business is exercising not only a right and a privilege but is discharging a duty which, in a spirit of teamwork, it owes to the Government.

But it is just as important that business should not undertake to usurp the legislative function as that government should not undertake to invade the realm of private business.

We must be mindful of the fact that the Congress of the United States, and other legislative assemblies, are, for the most part, composed of earnest, public spirited, and able men constituting a fair cross section of the public—including business—represented by them. We must be mindful of the fact that they have been designated to act for all of the people in the discharge of the legislative function, and the attitude of business toward them will be one of helpfulness in presenting facts on which to base sound conclusions. But business will neither seek to usurp the functions of government on the one hand, nor, on the other, sit by and decline to assist Government agencies and then criticize whatever they may do. On the contrary, business will do its full part toward stimulating a spirit of teamwork between government and business in the interest of an all-embracing general prosperity.

Thus far we have dealt with teamwork and with prosperity within our own Nation. But America can not, if she would, and would not if she could, live unto herself alone. She is in, and of, the world, with rights and privileges and correlative duties and responsibilities with respect to the world. Just as, applied to our Nation, a prosperity to endure must be general, embracing all classes, achieved through teamwork participated in by all classes, so an international prosperity can not be achieved without whole-hearted teamwork on the part of the business community of all nations. American business has pledged itself to such teamwork. Through its American section, affiliated with the national chamber, it actively participated in organizing and has whole-heartedly supported the International Chamber of Commerce, through which business of all nations meets on common ground to consider, to analyze, and to solve international business problems. These problems will increasingly engage the attention of American business.

In its intercourse with foreigners American business will scrupulously observe the principles of business conduct which it has adopted for its guidance at home, and jealously guard the reputation of American business as a whole, thus establishing and maintaining internationally that confidence which is the foundation of all business.

Our business in foreign countries can not be extended and put on a firm basis by force. While American business is entitled to the reasonable and proper protection of its Government in foreign fields, it is a mistake to enter such fields if force is constantly required for its adequate protection. Rather should the quality of our product, the excellence of the service to be rendered, and the confidence inspired by fair dealing insure to American business a welcome to every land, not for the purpose of exploiting either its natural resources or its peoples but to assist in its growth and development, and to render a service through the fair exchange for its products of whatever America may have to offer.

America is the great creditor nation of the world, notwithstanding which the balance of trade in its favor is constantly increasing! America has in its vaults 45 per cent of the gold of the world! Her standards of living are the highest in the history of the world!

These and similar statements are heard in our countingrooms, at public gatherings, in hotel lobbies at home and abroad, and constantly appear in our press. Well—what of it? Why this constant proclaiming of facts already too well known to our neighbors of other nations? Would it not become us to have more regard for our neighbors' sensibilities? It is true that industry and prudence have combined with circumstances to bring to our country an unusual degree of prosperity; but can it be that we have not the stamina to stand prosperity? Can it be that prosperity and poise can not walk hand in hand? Must not the constant rehearsal and parading of our prosperity prove offensive to our neighbors? Does it not better become us to dwell on the responsibilities to ourselves and to the rest of the world which this prosperity implies, and cultivate an attitude of humility rather than self-satisfied superiority?

America is on trial before the world. How shall we use the leisure which the growth of mechanical power has provided? How shall we use the power which accumulated wealth has placed in our grasp? Does not the answer turn on the degree of intelligence and self-control developed and used by the Nation or the individual, as the case may be? Will America meet this test and, instead of flaunting her prosperity, seriously and with her accustomed efficiency discharge her responsibilities, dedicating her prosperity to service, to the task of making the life of the peoples of the world fuller and freer and more abundant? Is not this America's place on the world's team?

Every individual within the sound of my voice will indorse this message—your message—to the world. While the voice of the individual is weak, the resounding chorus of organized business will be heard throughout our Nation. We all at times become discouraged with the slow processes of group action. Business men as a rule thrive on direct action. But in such moments of discouragement remember that business as a whole is much more progressive than the average business man. Remember that it is only through teaming with his fellows, working for his industry through his trade association, working for his community through his chamber of commerce—nationally through this organization, internationally through the international chamber—that the aspirations of the individual can be realized.

The machinery is at hand. Let us use it to the full.

Will not this chamber at this its sixteenth annual meeting repudiate those whose ruthless methods tend to discredit all business, and reaffirm its allegiance to those sound principles of conduct which beget confidence, upon which to endure all business must rest?

As members of this American federation of business, shall we not pledge ourselves to team play with every element of the community of which we are a part, and with our neighbors of other lands, to achieve an all-embracing prosperity, inclusive of all groups and all classes?

Shall we not dedicate anew our best efforts to the diligent pursuit of the greatest of all vocations—the business of right living—proclaiming to the world that he who would be great among us must become the servant of all?

Resolution adopted by United States Chamber of Commerce, May 11, 1928

GROUP RESPONSIBILITIES

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States declares its confidence in the general integrity and sound ideals of modern business. These are brought into high relief by recent disclosures of individual violation of established business practices.

American business is jealous of its good name, insists upon protecting its professional status by the maintenance of the highest standards, and intends scrupulously to discharge its group responsibilities.

Chief among such responsibilities is that of purging business of all those who indulge in commercial and political corruption and through resort to unclean practices bring business into disrepute and shock the sensibilities of all decent citizens.

The chamber declares that the moral turpitude of corruptors of public servants is even greater than that of those whom they debauch.

The chamber emphasizes its principle of business conduct which provides that "corporate forms do not absolve from or alter the moral obligations of individuals." It maintains that stockholders of corporations owe it to themselves, to the Government, and to the profession of business publicly to repudiate those who misrepresent them. Such stockholders can not accept the profits flowing from corruption and escape the moral stigma which inheres in such profits. Neither can they permit those who act for them to profit personally through corrupt corporate transactions or shield others who do.

The chamber reaffirms its allegiance to the principles of business conduct adopted at its annual meeting in 1924, and particularly does it reaffirm the principle that "business should render restrictive legislation unnecessary through so conducting itself as to deserve and inspire public confidence."

STREET-CAR FARES IN NEW YORK

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we are very much perturbed in New York City over the transit situation. There is a feeling of resentment that this matter has been referred to the Federal courts. I ask to have printed in the RECORD, in connection with these brief remarks, certain resolutions passed by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of the City of New York two days ago with reference to that matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions are as follows:

BOARD OF ESTIMATE AND APPORTIONMENT, CITY OF NEW YORK.

Whereas the city of New York entered into a certain contract with the Interborough Rapid Transit Co. whereby the city leased its transit properties to be managed and operated by that corporation for a fare not to exceed 5 cents; and

Whereas this contract has been in existence for many years, and since its execution the Interborough Rapid Transit Co., through its officials and counsel, has repeatedly referred to this written instrument as a "contract" at every time and place wherein it was a subject of discussion or litigation; and

Whereas this instrument was intended to be, and by the frequent concession of the Interborough Rapid Transit Co., through its officials and counsel, was conceded to be, and actually is and has been, a "contract" without any reservation as to what that term implies; and

Whereas the Interborough Rapid Transit Co. is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York and doing business wholly within the jurisdiction of the State of New York; and

Whereas the city of New York as a political unit also wholly within the territory of the State of New York; and

Whereas for the purpose of what amounts to a violation of the aforesaid contract which has been in effect for many years the Interborough Rapid Transit Co. has now invoked the jurisdiction of the United States Federal court; and

Whereas the said United States Federal court has assumed jurisdiction in this matter and prevented the issues therein being determined in the State court, and has handed down the unanimous decision which, in effect, permits the Interborough Rapid Transit Co. to violate one of the fundamental terms of the aforesaid contract that has been in force and effect for a long period of time: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of the City of New York, acting on behalf of over 6,000,000 people residing within the boundaries of the said city, memorialize the Congress of the United States, respectfully petitioning that body to enact such amendment or amendments to the law as will prevent the continuance of the practice resorted to by the Interborough Rapid Transit Co., and in particular that section 380 of the Federal Judicial Code be limited so as not to apply to a case where both parties are residents of the same State unless and until it is shown to the Federal court that the parties to the action could not obtain justice by recourse to the State courts; and be it further

Resolved, That the board of estimate and apportionment call upon the people of New York City to communicate with their Representatives in the national legislative body, urging upon them the need of immediately enacting such legislation that will insure the inviolability of contracts.

Indorsed: A true copy of resolution adopted by the board of estimates and apportionment May 10, 1928.

JOSEPH F. HIGGINS,
Assistant Secretary.

WOMEN'S INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE OF PEACE AND FREEDOM

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD an article from the Washington Eagle relating to an article which was, at my request, printed in the RECORD on March 21, 1928, at page 5094.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Eagle, Friday, May 11, 1928]

RACE REPRESENTATIVE ATTENDS WILLARD HOTEL DINNER

Neval H. Thomas, president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People of Washington, and member of the national board of directors, attended the annual banquet of the Women's International League of Peace and Freedom at the New Willard Hotel on Friday evening. This is the same group that fostered the Villard dinner some weeks ago at the Hotel Washington. The colored readers of the Nation were refused admission when these ladies were arranging the contracts for the Nation dinner by the Mayflower, and the organization declined to hold the function there or to make it the headquarters of their national convention here this week. By this high ground that these women are taking the Mayflower lost thousands of dollars.

At the banquet of the national gathering held there on Friday, Jane Addams spoke and presided. Senator DILL, of Washington State; Representative HAMILTON FISH, Jr., and Horace Knowles, former minister to Santo Domingo, spoke on the Caribbean situation. Mr. Knowles, an authority on our relations with South America, paid glowing tribute to the genius of the Haitian Republic, and spoke in eloquent and bitter condemnation of our conquest of Haiti. When he said, "I have associated with the black statesmen of this black Republic. They are trained in the universities of Europe, and are as able and cultured as the best white statesmen in our own country," the vast banquet hall simply roared with prolonged applause.

PRISON-MADE GOODS

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table a letter addressed to me by W. R. Bradford, of Fort Mill, S. C., a member of the board of directors of the South Carolina Penitentiary; also a letter addressed to me by William H. Jones, president of the Jones School Supply Co., of Columbia, S. C.; a letter addressed to me by E. R. Cass, of New York City, N. Y., president of the American Prison Association; and a letter addressed to me by John L. Moorman, president of the board of trustees of the Indiana State Prison, Michigan City, Ind., relative to the so-called Hawes-Cooper prison labor bill, introduced in the Senate by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FORT MILL TIMES,
Fort Mill, S. C., March 9, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: I am inclosing herewith a letter addressed to you relative to the proposed Hawes law against prison-made goods being sold in certain States. Macaulay tells me that you are opposed to the bill; but it occurred to me that it might help a little if one of the directors of our penitentiary would write you his views with the view of asking you to have the letter inserted in the RECORD. I don't know whether I have written anything worth printing in the RECORD or not. I hope it is no worse than some other matter the RECORD carries. For certain reasons I shall probably print the letter in the Fort Mills Times this week, unless you object, since it is addressed to you. If you can see your way clear to have it printed in the RECORD and will wire me to that effect either Tuesday or Wednesday, I shall be obliged and grateful to you. In the wire I should like to have you say when the letter will be printed in the RECORD. I have seen two or three similar letters in the RECORD concerning the Hawes bill. * * *

If I can serve you in any way I shall be pleased to do so. It may be I will be in Washington next Friday and Saturday, and if I am I shall call at your office to speak to you.

Very respectfully yours,

BRADFORD.

FORT MILL, S. C., March 9, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: As a member of the board of directors of the South Carolina Penitentiary, I am taking the liberty of writing you with reference to the Hawes bill, now pending in the Senate, which provides that prison-made goods shall not be sold in certain States of the Union. I urge that you give this bill your earnest consideration and that, if possible, you use your very great influence to prevent its passage.

The purpose of the Hawes bill, I am informed, is to prevent the sale of goods made in prisons in such States as now have, or may hereafter enact, laws proscribing the sale within their borders of such goods. I believe that the passage of the Hawes bill will ultimately destroy the market for the furniture we manufacture at our penitentiary, as it will ultimately destroy the market for the articles manufactured at the other State prisons of the country.

I was fortunate enough to be able to attend a meeting of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate a few days ago held to give opponents of the bill an opportunity to be heard. At the meeting the statement was made that the principal proponents of the bill were the American Federation of Labor and the Federation of Women's Clubs. The statement should be investigated. The American Federation of Labor, it was claimed, has a membership of 5,000,000 people, all committed to the passage of the bill. The claim may or may not be true. It is probable that it is not true. Likely enough some central body of the American Federation of Labor has gone on record as favoring the passage of the bill. Then the word is put out to influence Members of Congress who have not the time to investigate the accuracy of the claim that the great labor body is solidly behind the bill and, incidentally, will have fault to find with Members who do not support it when the time comes for their reelection. I dare say there are hundreds of local unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor which are in no wise interested in the passage of the Hawes bill. Indeed, it is not unlikely that many of the local unions never heard of the bill. Nevertheless, we are told that organized labor is a unit for its passage.

A similar claim is set up as to the attitude of the Federation of Women's Clubs toward the bill. A meeting of representatives of the women's clubs is held in Washington City, at which a resolution is passed indorsing the Hawes bill. Then the Interstate Commerce Committee is told that the Federation of Women's Clubs is behind the bill and is demanding its passage. This statement is bunk. By and large, the women's clubs of the country know nothing about the Hawes bill, and care less about it. The women's clubs of South Carolina—and there are hundreds of them here. too many for the good of some homes represented in them—like the women's clubs of the other States, are not interested in this bill and have not gone on record as favoring it. I do not believe that the Hawes bill has ever been considered in a single woman's club in the whole State of South Carolina.

So much for the alleged attitude of organized labor and the women's clubs toward the bill, to say nothing of other interests seeking its passage from the private gain point of view.

Many good reasons can be urged, and ought to be urged, it seems to me, against the passage of the bill. Of course, I am immediately concerned with the effect the bill, if enacted into law, will have on our penitentiary in South Carolina. To-day we have something like 400 prisoners in our penitentiary. Most of these prisoners work in the furniture factory at tasks they are able to perform. None of them are subjected to hardships in connection with their work, and most of them are paid a bonus for good work. All are well fed, well clothed, and humanely treated in every way. The State, in consequence of its considerate treatment of the prisoners, makes a profit on the furniture produced in the factory. The furniture is not sold at cutthroat prices as some claim is the case with all prison-made goods. If we are forced to close our furniture factory under the Hawes bill, what sort of employment shall we find for the prisoners who work in the factory, and what sort of employment shall we find for the 75 other prisoners who work on our cotton farms? If we are prohibited from making furniture to be sold in interstate commerce, we may be expected to stop raising cotton which finds its way into articles now sold outside the State. Certainly it seems reasonable to conclude that we would not be allowed to sell prison-raised cotton in any State coming under the operation of the Hawes law. And if we are not allowed to sell our furniture or cotton under the Hawes law, who can think of an article our prisoners might manufacture or produce which would not be similarly proscribed? Anything that might be produced by prison labor will come into competition with free labor.

If it is reasonable for Congress to say to South Carolina that South Carolina shall not sell its prison-made goods in other States, why is it not also reasonable for Congress to say to this State that the building of good roads with prison labor must stop in this State because it would be better to build the roads with free labor and because the roads these prisoners build are used in interstate commerce? Which would mean idleness for the 1,500 county prisoners in the State.

We shall be hard pressed to find employment, we fear, for our prisoners if the Hawes bill becomes a law. The people of this State will rebel against paying taxes to provide for the upkeep of idle prisoners, with the effect that it will discourage convictions in our courts.

While Congress is considering the plea of those who are seeking to have the Hawes bill become a law, it ought not to be too much to hope that Congress will also consider the interest of the large number of prisoners in the country and the millions of citizens who do not want such a law. Not one of the 48 States in the Union, so far as I am informed, has appealed to Congress through its governor or through its legislature to pass the Hawes bill.

If Congress is ever to reach a stopping place in encroaching on the rights of the States, it seems to me that the Hawes bill offers a good stopping place.

Very respectfully yours,

W. R. BRADFORD.

COLUMBIA, S. C., March 24, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senator from South Carolina,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is in reference to Hawes bill S. 1940 relating to prison-made goods. We wish to express ourselves as being opposed to this bill.

This bill seeks to divest prison-made goods of their interstate character. It will ultimately mean the several States going into the manufacture of everything used by institutions within the State, thus competing with outside labor and ultimately destroying enterprises that go to support and make possible the existence of the State itself.

I have made a study of this bill and believe that it will prove harmful to both labor and to industry. I shall greatly appreciate it if you will consider voting against it when it comes up for passage.

Respectfully yours,

WM. H. JONES,
President Jones School Supply Co.

THE AMERICAN PRISON ASSOCIATION, OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
New York, April 2, 1928.

Hon. COLEMAN L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: I note your interest in the prison labor bill introduced by Senator HAWES, of Missouri. Inclosed herewith is a general statement on the prison labor problem, prepared by me, and presented at the time of the National Crime Commission conference in Washington, the early part of November. Since you are interested in the pending legislation, I think you will want to give this your earnest consideration.

The need for providing employment for the inmates of penal and correctional institutions is one of the serious problems confronting the administrators of those institutions. Usually legislation having as its purpose the curtailing of the movement of the products of prison labor does not give any assurance of continuing what little employment now exists in the various institutions throughout the country and does give indication that the deplorable and demoralizing idleness among the inmates in those institutions will increase.

I hope that the inclosed pamphlet will give you a well-rounded picture of the prison-labor problem, and thus aid you in your discussion of Senator HAWES's bill.

If you can use several of the pamphlets we shall be glad to send them to you.

Very truly yours,

E. R. CASS, President.

INDIANA STATE PRISON,
Michigan City, Ind., March 30, 1928.

Senator COLE BLEASE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I notice where you have uttered some protest against the passage of the prison labor bill introduced by Senator HAWES, of Missouri, and Representative COOPER, of Ohio. It was my privilege to appear before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate and the Committee on Labor in the House in opposition to the passage of this measure. Before the Senate committee I made the remarks which you will find printed in the inclosure. This pamphlet gives my ideas on prison-labor problems after long years of practical study in connection with the Indiana State Prison, located at Michigan City.

As Senator HAWES says, this measure has passed the House two or three times, and has been as far along in the Senate as it now is. As an officer of the State prison I have repeatedly appeared before the various committees in Washington in opposition to this measure in some form or another. I have no personal interest in the matter, except as a citizen of the State and as an officer of this institution. It has been my observation for many years past that the proponents of measures of this type profess to represent union labor, manufacturers' associations, and women's organizations. I have never heard them say they represented the prisoners or their dependents or the taxpayers of the various States who are directly concerned financially in the upkeep of the prisons. To me it looks like a selfish proposition, so far as the union labor or manufacturers' organizations are concerned. Women's organizations seize upon the prison problems as a sort of fad, and they allow themselves to be used in support of a cause about which they know nothing for sure.

Union labor and manufacturers make a mountain out of a mole hill, so far as prison labor is concerned as being in opposition to them. Statistics show that goods manufactured within prison walls or by prisoners represent only one-twentieth of 1 per cent of goods produced beyond the walls. Senator HAWES comes from a State which makes many shoes. I presume the shoe industries strongly urge him to support such a measure, and he responds to the call of his constituents. In the State of Ohio union labor caused to be enacted some very drastic prison laws some few years ago, and is doing great damage to the penal institutions of that State. More than half of the prisoners of that State are idle and the prisoners are maintained at a heavy cost to the taxpayers.

Governor Donahey is opposed to this bill, or anything of the kind, yet Mr. COOPER of Ohio advocates the passage of this bill. I presume he, too, is under the sway of union labor.

As a citizen and a taxpayer I can see no earthly excuse for the enactment of this measure. It could gain so very little for union labor or manufacturers, but at the same time it could do very great damage to the taxpayers and to the dependents of prisoners and to prisoners themselves. I appraise this bill as only an enabling act. It would merely serve as a stepping-stone for organizations in various States to force through restrictive legislation. In my solemn judgment inside of 10 years not a prison in the land would be near self-sustaining, but, on the other hand, idleness would be the rule. In the States of the South that produce sugar and cotton with prison help such restrictive legislation as this would be destructive. In my State, where we manufacture chairs, binder twine, clothing, signs, tinware, etc., we would be shut out of the markets in the general fields. Our State could not any way near consume such products as our institution would make along these lines. We would be compelled to diversify our industries at a great expense, and I fear it would be at no profit if we are compelled to sell all our goods within our own State.

In 10 years' time the population of my State has increased almost 200 per cent. We are constantly making room for more prisoners, and the stream flows on toward our doors with ever-increasing volume. If the Government could do something to reduce crime it would be much better than to do something to harrass and distress prison officials who are charged with the ever-increasing colony of criminals.

I was told at Washington recently that both the Senate and the House favored the passage of this bill. Just why they favored it they did not say. To my way of thinking, it is done for the simple and sole purpose of favoring certain organizations with a view to gaining votes in the coming elections. If prisoners or prison officials were as powerful politically as organized labor or manufacturers' organizations or women's associations, I do not believe any Member of Congress would think of introducing such a bill. Prisons are the football of designing politicians, of fad-following women's organizations, and the like can say anything they please about a prison and there is no comeback.

I want you to know, Senator, it is a distressing situation, viewed from the standpoint of men who are charged with the control of these penal institutions. We are expected to conduct them along proper lines and at as small a cost to the State as possible, with very rare encouragement from lawmaking bodies. On the other hand, we are compelled to defend ourselves against these bodies.

Even in my own State bills were introduced at the last session of the legislature which, if enacted into law, would have certainly closed down the industries in this place. I do not know what is coming over the people. A statesman once said, "Laws are not made; they are discovered." Now, if any man can discover a single reason that will stand the light of day for a moment for the enactment of the Hawes-Cooper measure I would be very glad indeed to see it.

When Congress wants to find out something about the tariff question or some other question they call in people who are familiar with the facts and make a thorough investigation. It was not so with the prison-labor question. If some of us had not been on the watch we would not have known when the hearings were had, especially in the Senate. Why do they not call upon prison wardens and men who are interested in the control of prisons and get their attitudes upon the subject fairly and honestly before they write any new laws?

My dear Senator, I hope I have not bored you by this long letter. I am very full of this subject and have given years of my life in an effort to better prison conditions. I sometimes feel very bitter when I am compelled to listen to the arguments men and women produce in favor of restricting labor within prison walls. I can only hope that you will have splendid success in your opposition to the Hawes-Cooper bill. If I come to Washington any more this season I would like the privilege of calling upon you at your office.

Yours very truly,

JOHN L. MOORMAN,
President Board Trustees, Indiana State Prison.

CIVILIAN ASSISTANTS, OFFICE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, there is on the calendar, and has been for a long time, a bill providing for the employment of civilian assistants in the office of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands and fixing the salaries at certain figures. It is Calendar 396, Senate bill 2292, introduced by the late Senator Willis. A similar bill was introduced in the House by Congressman KIESS. I presume nearly every Senator has received certain communications from Manuel L. Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate, and a letter in regard to the bill in opposition to it. I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of War inclosing a cablegram recently received from Governor General Stimson in regard to the statement of President Quezon; and also an article from the Mindanao Herald of March 24, 1928, written by Governor General Stimson himself, in which he gives his reasons for asking for the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter and article are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 9, 1928.

Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BINGHAM: The following cablegram has been received from Governor General Stimson to-day:

"Reference Quezon statement there is absolutely no evidence in attitude insular press or of people toward me of alleged evil effect of pendency Willis-Kiess bills. My advocacy of bills was well known before my arrival and repeated in formal statement by me 10 days after arrival explaining purpose of bills. This received with friendliness even by portion of press opposed to bills. This friendliness and cooperation with my administration has steadily increased ever since. My opinion cooperation with me will not be jeopardized by passage of bills, but may be seriously jeopardized by their failure, showing lack of support at home. On the other hand, experience shows even more clearly the necessity of nonpolitical inspectors and assistants provided by bill. Charges of malfeasance, oppression, and fraud in some portion insular, provincial, or local governments are matters of almost daily occurrence, and in most cases complainant requests me to make personal or American investigation charging ordinary Filipino official investigating agencies with political bias. While most of such charges unfounded, there are many cases where a thorough nonpolitical investigation absolutely imperative; this need will inevitably increase with development of autonomy, which I propose because the increased powers and responsibilities which I am giving to the department heads requires corresponding ability on my part to check up the exercise of such powers. The Willis bill, thus, instead of being a backward step, is indispensable to progress in self-government. At present have absolutely no such investigators available except so-called military staff and one or two officers Philippine constabulary. Action by Congress and not Philippine Legislature necessary because latter action would necessitate either confirmation such assistants by Philippine Senate or their appointment by the Secretary of War. Passage second bill for governor's non-Christian Provinces equally important, though not so immediately pressing. It is not true that Philippine Senate will readily confirm American governors. Nomination of Governor Early, the most outstanding and successful of such governors, was held up nearly two years and finally confirmed only under emotional reaction caused by General Wood's death."

Sincerely yours,

DWIGHT F. DAVIS, Secretary of War.

[From the Mindanao Herald, March 24, 1928]

"SUPERVISION AND CONTROL"—GOVERNOR GENERAL STIMSON EXPLAINS HOW KIESS-WILLIS BILL WILL ASSIST IN MORE RAPID EXTENSION OF AUTONOMY

There has been a great deal of misunderstanding in the Philippines regarding the intent and purposes of the proposed Kiess-Willis bill now before Congress for action. Politicians have tried to convince the people that it is a pernicious measure designed to curtail autonomy and set up the Governor General as an absolute czar. Nothing could be further from the truth. The bill merely clarifies the original intent of the Jones law, and empowers the Governor General to exercise that "supervision and control" over the gradual development of autonomy in the government which is essential to success. Colonel Stimson has issued a straightforward statement, giving his reasons for urging the passage of the legislation, which should put a quietus to the bogey-man propaganda. The statement follows:

"A member of my cabinet has suggested that a statement of my views on the Kiess-Willis bill would relieve apprehension and misunderstanding here. It appears that there is fear lest I will create a supercabinet in case the bill is passed or interfere with the development of responsibility and autonomy among the present department heads. No greater mistake could be made.

"The Kiess bill contemplates two classes of appointments by the Governor General: First, technical advisers; and, second, assistants to perform duties of investigation for him. The need for the first is becoming more evident every year. In my inaugural address I alluded to the necessity of stimulating economic development in these islands. During the past 40 years the Philippines have failed to make the progress which their friends have desired in the diversification of their agriculture. In some respects it may even be said that they have been approaching a one-crop development. Forty years ago they lost the cultivation of coffee, which had previously been an important crop, but, unlike Java, which suffered the same loss at the same time, they have never restored that crop.

"To-day there is reason to believe that their monopoly in hemp is threatened, both by disease and by the cultivation of substitutes in other competing countries. While other industries have to some extent been introduced, I think all friends of the islands will agree that the progress and development of a wide and diversified agriculture has not been as rapid or energetic as our needs demand, and to-day we are too much dependent upon the prosperity of our chief crop—sugar.

"It is my intention, if granted the financial resources provided in the Kiess bill, to use a portion of it in the employment of the best possible advisers, both for advice on the kinds and methods of crops and industries needed, and also as to the financial methods necessary for the safe encouragement of such new crops. I feel keenly my need of such advice, and believe that any Governor General in my position would feel his own needs as I do. Such advisers would not be permanent appointees; they would not become a part of a permanent staff; they might not even be appointed on full time.

"They would be sought for in all places and under all conditions where the best men could be found to do a specific work or make a specific report, and would leave when that work was done. It is clear that special provision must be made for such employment, and that it can not be left to the routine of the permanent civil staff of the islands.

"The other class of assistants contemplated by the act are men to perform special investigation for the Governor General in the exercise of his duties of 'supervision and control' under the Jones law. But in this there is no intention of interfering with regular department inspection and supervision. The Department of the Interior has an executive bureau which regularly performs such work, and has done it very well in the past.

"Every department head will be expected to rigidly supervise and inspect his department in the future and will be held responsible for it. But your own law, in section 64 of the administrative code, imposes upon the Governor General the duty of making 'when in his opinion the good of the public service so requires an investigation of any action or the conduct of any person in the Government service.' Past history has abundantly shown the value and necessity of such special investigation, and the department heads upon whom rests the duty of regular and normal inspection would be the first to recognize the importance of these special investigations and to admit that cases frequently arise which can be handled only in that way, and for which routine departmental investigation does not offer a sufficient remedy.

"Indeed, the further we proceed in cultivating autonomy in the departments and imposing upon their heads responsibility of supervision in their own departments, the more important it is that the Governor General should be possessed of the necessary machinery, like his eyes and ears, to keep him informed how that autonomous development is working. The more freedom he allows to his department heads in making their daily decisions the more necessary is it for him to be able to inform himself when occasion arises how that trust has been carried out. Otherwise his responsibility of 'supervision and control' under the Jones law might be entirely defeated by ignorance of the actual workings of the Government.

"There is nothing in the proposition to appoint these two classes of assistants to the Governor General which is at all unusual. Such technical advice is provided for in the laws of most of our American States, including, as I happen to know, my own State of New York.

"It is my purpose, if granted the means by the passage of the Kiess bill, to devote a portion of it to the employment of the most competent and trustworthy men for the making of such investigations. No other consideration than fitness would enter into those appointments. It would be my aim to employ for that purpose both Filipinos and Americans, wherever men of the requisite fidelity and intelligence can be secured.

"Now, the reason of having this provision made by the Congress of the United States in the form of an amendment to the Jones Act, and not by the Philippine Legislature, is simply this: All of these appointments, as I have pointed out, must be made upon the basis of merit and fitness alone; politics must not enter into their selection. They must be solely responsible to the Governor General, because they are acting as his eyes and ears in performing one of his most sacred duties imposed upon him by the Jones law. Provision can not be made for such appointments by the Philippine Legislature unless they are either subject to confirmation by the Philippine Senate or appointed by the Secretary of War in Washington, as was provided by the recent appropriation vetoed by Governor Gilmore.

"Neither of these methods would meet with entire satisfaction the requisites of these appointments. Confirmation by the Senate would inevitably introduce political consideration. Appointment by the Secretary of War, in Washington, even under the best of circumstances and the most cordial cooperation between the Secretary of War and the Governor General, would diminish the personal responsibility of the Governor General, and might tend to introduce foreign considerations to appointments which should be made solely with reference to the need here in the islands.

"Therefore, while I shall not reject any assistance which might be offered me by the insular legislature and shall regard their willingness to make such appropriation as a fine gesture of good will, in my opinion it would not be as effective for the purpose which I believe we all unite in desiring, as if it were made by an amendment to the organic law by the Congress of the United States.

"It has been my hope that consideration of these facts and circumstances, which seem to me to govern the situation, will gradually lead those who have feared or opposed the new Kiess bill (which, by the way, is an entirely different, and in my opinion much more favorable bill to the islands than the old Kiess bill) to withdraw their opposition and assist in the working out of the common purpose which has for its object solely the benefit of the islands and the development of an efficient and autonomous government."

MOTHERS' DAY

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, for more than 19 centuries mankind has had three unfailing sources of inspiration to heroic efforts, great accomplishments, and sublime achievements. For more than nineteen hundred years the three words that represent these ever-flowing fountains of inspiration have charmed the ears, brightened the hopes, and thrilled the hearts of all the children of men. They have incited the genius that has produced the most exquisite pictures ever painted, the most beautiful poems ever written, the most melodious songs ever sung—songs, poems, and pictures that have given us sunshine for our shadows, joy for our sorrows, smiles for our tears, and intimated to us the endless bliss of immortality in that "realm where the rainbow never fades," where no one ever grows old, where friends never part and loved ones never, never die.

These three mighty, magic, and inspiring words are "Jesus," "Home," and "Mother."

The first of them impelled Charles Wesley to write:

Jesus, lover of my soul.
Let me to thy bosom fly;
While the nearer waters roll,
While the tempest still is high.

All my trust on Thee is stayed;
All my help from Thee I bring;
Cover my defenseless head
With the shadow of thy wing.

Hide me, O my Saviour, hide,
Till the storm of life is past;
Safe into the haven guide,
O receive my soul at last.

What unspeakable consolation born of boundless faith in the everlasting Father's imperishable love for His erring children is revealed in this beautiful hymn. Its music, "like a sea of glory, has spread from pole to pole."

The second of our magic words prompted John Howard Payne to compose that deathless song that has been sung and played around the world. Millions of weary wanderers on foreign strands have been transported upon the wings of imagination back to the romantic scenes of their childhood, to the picturesque paths which their infancy knew, to the happy days of the long ago by that soothing symphony of sublime sentiment:

'Mid pleasures and palaces though we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home;
A charm from the sky seems to hallow us there,
Which, seek through the world, is ne'er met with elsewhere.

Home! home! sweet, sweet home!
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.

And the last of this tranquilizing trinity of wondrous words, with the stirring force of the celestial muse of Isaiah, impelled Elizabeth Akers Allen to write the following pathetic, appealing, and rapturous poem that is destined to live until the everlasting hills, "the vales stretching in pensive quietness between," and "old oceans gray and melancholy waste," shall be no more:

Backward, turn backward, O Time, in your flight,
Make me a child again just for to-night!
Mother, come back from the echoless shore,
Take me again to your heart, as of yore;
Kiss from my forehead the furrows of care,
Smooth the few silver threads out of my hair;
Over my slumber your loving watch keep,
Rock me to sleep, Mother, rock me to sleep.

Backward, flow backward, O tide of the years!
I am so weary of toil and of tears—
Toil without recompense, tears all in vain,
Take them and give me my childhood again!
I have grown weary of dust and decay,
Weary of flinging my soul-wealth away;
Weary of sowing for others to reap;
Rock me to sleep, Mother, rock me to sleep.

Mother, dear mother, the years have been long
Since I last hushed to your lullaby song.
Sing then, and unto my soul it shall seem Manhood's years have been only a dream.
Clasped to your breast in a loving embrace,
With your light lashes just sweeping my face.
Never hereafter to wake or to weep—
Rock me to sleep, Mother, rock me to sleep.

Kings and potentates and parliaments have proclaimed holidays, thanksgiving days, and emancipation days for observance by the people of various kingdoms and countries and states. But Miss Anna M. Jarvis, a distinguished woman of West Virginia, has established Mothers' Day in the love, in the devotion, and in the throbbing heart of the humanity of all the world.

To-day we venerate the sacred name and memory of mother. We laud the virtue, extol the spirit of self-sacrifice, and eulogize the loving kindness of every mother living; and in imagination, with bowed heads, grateful hearts, and generous hands lay new wreaths of the freshest, the fairest, and the most fragrant flowers upon the graves of all the mothers who have gone from the fitful land of the living into the silent land of the dead. In this hour of sober and serious reflection we realize that everyone who treads the globe owes his birth to the unspeakable agony of a mother. From mother's breast the baby first was fed. In mother's arms the baby first was lulled to sleep. Mother, in the twilight hour of baby's existence, breathed the fervent prayer:

That He who stills the raven's clamorous nest,
And decks the lily fair in flowery pride,
Would, in the way His wisdom sees the best,
For her darling child provide; but chiefly
In her loved one's heart, with grace divine preside.

Then, as the days grew into the months and the months lengthened into the years, mother's life became a continuous round of solicitude, service, and sacrifice for her child.

Mother's hands made the first dress that baby ever wore. Mother's deft fingers made playthings for the little one that filled his eyes with wonder and his heart with joy.

A splinter in baby's finger, a briar in baby's foot, or a bruise on baby's toe became an affliction of such momentous consequence that only mother could heal it; only mother could banish its ache; only mother could exile its pain; only mother could smile away the tears it caused to flow down baby's cheeks.

And a little later mother, like an inexhaustible encyclopedia of universal knowledge, informed her baby about the birds and the beasts and the flowers and the trees. She discussed with him the cause of day and night; of winter's storm and summer's calm; the mysteries of the earth and sea and sky. She explained as best she could the marvels of the sun and moon and stars and the grandeur of the far-off Milky Way.

And the little one at night upon his knees, at mother's side, with mother's hand upon his head, learned to say in the lisping accents of childhood:

Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep,
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take.
And this I ask for Jesus' sake.
Amen.

Thus from the day of the birth of her babe, "toiling, sorrowing, rejoicing, onward through life mother goes," generously giving the best of her thought and energy and effort and life to make of her child a successful, useful, and righteous woman or man.

But until—

The stars are old,
And the sun grows cold,
And the leaves of the judgment book unfold—

No one will ever know the full measure of service the mothers of earth have constantly rendered their children.

The following touching story illustrates the fact that the average mother is ever ready to sacrifice as sublimely for her children as the mother pelican is said to sacrifice for her young by feeding them the lifeblood from her breast:

A poverty-stricken Italian woman was by the death of her husband compelled to work hard in a "sweatshop" to support her three little children. A humane organization learned that this unfortunate woman was in the last stage of consumption and endeavored to take her from her task. But she resisted and continued to work until she died of a hemorrhage. During this martyr's last moments some one inquired of her why she had worked so hard and so long. And she gasped, "I had to work to get the grub for the kids."

Greater love than this has no woman shown. She laid down her life for her children.

Just such love as this poor, dying Italian woman had for her children every other mother has for her own.

In token of our appreciation of the great boon of maternal devotion which we all enjoy, or have enjoyed in the days gone by, let us habitually exalt the name, commemorate the memory, and sing the praises of our mothers, and let us devoutly beseech our Heavenly Father to love them and keep them, and shower His richest blessings upon them forever and forever.

O mother, thou wert ever one with nature,
All things fair spoke to my soul of thee;
The azure depths of air,
Sunrise and starbeam, and the moonlight rare,
Splendors of summer, winter's frost and snow,
Autumn's rich glow, bird, river, flower, and tree.

Mother, thou wert in love's first whisper,
And the slow thrill of its dying kiss;
In the strong ebb and flow of the resistless tides of joy and woe;
In life's supremest hour thou hadst a share,
Its stress of prayer, its rapturous trance of bliss.

Mother, leave me not now when the long shadows fall athwart the sunset bars;
Hold thou my soul in thrall till it shall answer to a mightier call,
Remain thou with me till the holy night puts out the light,
And kindles all the stars.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have listened with profound interest and pleasure to the beautiful and magnificent speech just made by the Senator from West Virginia. I would that every person in America could read that speech.

He referred to Miss Annie Jarvis, of Philadelphia. I remember that 16 years ago she came to Congress leading the movement to establish Mothers' Day. She lived in Congressman Hampton Moore's district. He told her to see me and request me to offer a resolution creating Mothers' Day.

We talked over the matter, and I told her that I should be glad to render any assistance I could; and I introduced a resolution naming the second Sunday in May as Mothers' Day. My resolution passed the House. The able and distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]—who has always been on the side of the good mothers of the country and the homes of America, and on the right side of every moral question—took charge of my resolution when it reached the Senate, and it passed this body. President Wilson approved it, and the great commoner, William Jennings Bryan, proclaimed it as Secretary of State.

The second Sunday in May has become a fixed institution in America. On that day, under my resolution, the flag is to be unfurled upon all public buildings of the land, and above the homes of the people in America; and that flag was never used in a more beautiful and sacred cause than when flying above that tender, gentle army, the mothers of America.

A poet has said, beautifully:

The greatest battle that ever was fought—
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the map of the world you will find it not;
It was fought by the mothers of men.

That is true, Mr. President.

Another poet has said:

The world at times has beat me back
In battles I have fought;
Not always has the god Success
Touched tasks in which I wrought.

Full oft has fortune dealt a blow
Instead of bent to bless;
And heartaches followed close upon
The heels of happiness.

And often, when a solemn woe
Of grief my heart intoned,
And often when my spirit writhed
And all my nature groaned.

There stole refrains that softened pain
Not phrased by mortal tongue
But born of memories old and sweet—
The songs my mother sung.

When she took me in her arms
And gently stroked my hair,
And bore me with her down to sleep
In that old bye-bye chair.

And he who, harking back to youth,
Goes forth and nobly tries
To color life to match the light
That shines from mother's eyes—

He'll not pride his faltering feet
Upon the race they've made,
But search his heart, and bless the part
That mother love has played.

He'll walk adown the ways of life,
And in his daily prayer
Thank God that all his best was born
In that old bye-bye chair.

Mr. LOCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the proclamation of the Governor of Ohio designating Sunday, May 13, as Mothers' Day.

There being no objection, the proclamation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF OHIO,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR, Columbus.

MOTHERS' DAY PROCLAMATION

The great awakening of nature, the season of spring, with its unfolding of all life from the sleep or shelter of winter, is again rejuvenating the hearts of all mankind. All around us we witness renewed activities in all realms for the advancement of human welfare and happiness.

It is natural that this season should stir us to worship the origin of all—God, the Creator of the universe—and inspire us to reverence for the mothers of the human race. We, in our individual and finite minds, trace our beginning to the heart of a noble being we know as mother.

Through infancy, youth, and maturity it is mother to whom we look for guidance, for understanding, for encouragement. It is she who inspires us to achievements and consoles us in misfortunes. Womanly intuition and insight, more than any other agency, has helped man over the rough and ragged places of life. All others may lose faith, but mothers believe in us with all the yearning of their loving souls to the last flicker of life.

Now, therefore, I, Vic Donahay, by virtue of authority vested in me as Governor of Ohio, and in accordance with established custom, do hereby designate Sunday, May 13, 1928, as Mothers' Day in the State of Ohio and request observance by all citizens in appropriate manner, that every mother may be compensated by tokens of appreciation and love for her sacrifices and services.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of Ohio to be affixed in the city of Columbus, this 2d day of May, A. D. 1928.

[SEAL.] VIC DONAHEY, Governor.

By the governor:

CLARENCE J. BROWN, Secretary of State.

abstract thereof showing the name and income of the taxpayer, at such times and in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment intended to be proposed by the junior Senator from Alabama will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the tax bills enacted during the war were free from partisanship, and special care was given to enact bills which gave full expression to the principle of ability to pay. Upon individuals a normal tax was levied, and then a surtax, so graduated as to make the individual's tax increase with the size of his income. The same principle was applied to corporations. A flat or normal tax was levied upon the net incomes of all corporations, and then a graduated war and excess-profits tax was levied, upon the theory that corporations should be taxed in proportion to their profits; that those corporations which had enjoyed war and excess profits should pay a higher tax than those making a moderate profit.

To my mind there were two defects in the tax bill of 1921.

The first and most glaring defect in this bill was that it reduced the taxes of profit-making corporations and increased the taxes of nonprofit-making corporations. This was done by eliminating the excess-profits tax and increasing the corporation income tax from 10 to 12½ per cent. For instance, in 1919 all corporations were taxed 10 per cent on their net income, and the corporations that earned a profit of over 8 per cent on their invested capital paid a graduated excess-profits tax. The excess-profits tax was eliminated in the act of 1921 and, for the purpose of replenishing the heavy loss to the Treasury, a flat increase from 10 to 12½ per cent was made on the net income of all corporations.

What was the result? The result was that all corporations earning less than 8 per cent on their capital stock after the enactment of that bill had their tax bill increased 25 per cent. It seemed to me at the time a condemnation by the Congress of the stupidity of those corporations who were not able to profiteer during the war, and indicated a desire upon its part to reward by a big tax reduction the ingenuity of many of those corporations that made very large profits during the war, by wiping out all their excess-profits taxes. Big business corporations achieved a great triumph, and struggling, limited profit-making corporations were penalized by that act. That injustice has continued from that day to this. Indeed, the burden of the small corporations has increased, for when we repealed the capital-stock tax in 1926, which exempted small corporations up to $5,000, the rate on incomes of corporations was increased to 13½ per cent.

By increasing in 1921 the tax upon the net incomes of corporations from 10 to 12½ per cent, a substantial increase was made in the income corporation tax where the earnings were approximately between 8 and 12 per cent. All corporations in the class earning more than 12 per cent had their taxes very substantially reduced. By the elimination of the excess-profits tax, the excess profits making corporations, it was estimated, were saved $450,000,000.

Whatever might be said—and very strong arguments were advanced in favor of the elimination of the excess-profits tax—no justification could then or now be found for increasing the tax upon the corporations that were in the class earning profits of less than 8 per cent. Indeed, the active lobby that gathered here in Washington at the time, representing big business, set its heart and soul, regardless of the equities, upon the elimination of the excess-profits tax. The principal argument advanced was that excess-profits taxes were taking the money of the capitalistic class away from productive enterprises.

The result of increasing the normal corporation income tax reduced somewhat the loss of $450,000,000 to the Treasury by the elimination of the excess-profits tax. I have not the exact figures showing how much that loss was reduced, but when it was contemplated to increase the net income corporation tax by 10 to 15 per cent, the claim was made that this increase would produce $267,000,000 to the Treasury. Because the tax was finally increased only 2½ per cent, and not 5 per cent, as recommended, the increase to the Treasury was considerably less than $267,000,000.

Let me put it in another way. The excess-profits making corporations were saved by that law $465,000,000, while the nonexcess-profits making corporations had their taxes increased probably more than $100,000,000.

WHAT ARE THE BUSINESSES OR INDUSTRIES THAT WERE FAVORED IN THE TAX BILL OF 1921?

That bill, I repeat, reduced the taxes of monopolitistic or excess-profits making corporations, and increased the taxes upon the struggling, competitive, and small business corporations. Not a single business concern in the country other than those in the class of excess-profits making corporations has been relieved of taxes since the war. Every class of taxpayer has had their taxes reduced, except the small dividend-making businesses that are incorporated.

Who were these excess profit-making corporations? They were usually corporations engaged in a business which assumed trust proportions. They were corporations which enjoyed some special privilege extended by the Government, such as patent rights.

THE NUMBER OF CORPORATIONS THAT BENEFITED

It is estimated that the number of corporations that paid an excess-profits tax prior to 1921 were about 100,000. About 100,000 other corporations paid a tax outside of the excess-profits class; that is, they showed a net income of less than 8 per cent. One hundred thousand other corporations had no income and paid no tax.

In 1918 the number of corporations which had a net income of less than $10,000 was 148,150 corporations. The number that had a net income of between ten and fifty thousand dollars was 37,053 corporations. The number with a net income of between $50,000 and $1,000,000 was about 15,500 corporations. The number with a net income of over $1,000,000, was 1,026. It was estimated in 1921 that 50,000 corporations had their taxes reduced, and 150,000 corporations had their taxes increased. Is it any wonder that when the tax bill of 1921 was passed, increasing the tax upon corporation incomes, the Manufacturers News, of Chicago, stated the effect of that tax very admirably in these words: "This tax will hit thousands of small manufacturers below the belt."

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE MAJORITY REPORT OF THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE, WHICH RECOMMENDS A TAX ON CORPORATION INCOMES OF 12½ PER CENT, AND THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE MINORITY MEMBERS OF THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE, RECOMMENDING A GRADUATE TAX ON CORPORATION INCOMES GRADUATED FROM 5 PER CENT TO 11½ PER CENT

The majority report recommends the continuation of the present injustice. While it does provide for a slight reduction in the present corporation income tax paid by all corporations, and increases the exemption from $2,000 to $3,000, it still retains, when we compare its recommendations with the corporation income taxes levied in 1919, an increase in that large class of small corporations which make modest, nonexcess profits.

Indeed, it still makes the tax bill of this class of corporations nearly 25 per cent higher than they were during and following the war and previous to the tax law of 1921. It does benefit by a further reduction of tax, the normal corporation income of those classes of corporations that were described during the war as excess-profits making corporations. In other words, since the war two substantial changes in corporation taxes proposed by the majority have and will result in lowering the tax bills of the excess-profits making class of corporations greatly below the taxes they paid during and following the war. The only corporations that have benefited by the Republican tax reductions are the big dividend-paying corporations. The small dividend-paying corporations have been actually penalized.

GRADUATED TAX ON SMALL CORPORATIONS

The minority proposal is a graduated tax upon corporation incomes with small net incomes paying a rate of 5 per cent upon their net income if the amount is not more than $7,000; 7 per cent if the amount is more than $7,000 and not more than $12,000; 9 per cent if such amount is more than $12,000 and not more than $15,000; and 11½ per cent if such amount is more than $15,000.

As 92.1 per cent of all corporations showed a net income of not over $25,000 in 1925, a very large percentage of all corporations will be affected by the graduated tax proposed.

This is not a new idea. It is now part of the House bill. Indeed, in 1921, I proposed and argued for an amendment proposing a graduated tax upon the incomes of corporations, as follows:

Ten per cent of such excess amount by which the net income does not exceed $100,000; 15 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income exceeds $100,000, and does not exceed $300,000; 20 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income exceeds $300,000: Provided, That a corporation which does not make a net taxable income of more than 8 per cent on its invested capital for the taxable year shall not be taxed on its net income more than 10 per cent.

This amendment was defeated in the Senate by only one vote.

A somewhat similar amendment, offered by me to that bill, was as follows:

Provided, That a corporation which did not pay an excess-profits tax upon its income for the calendar year 1920, under the revenue act of 1918, shall not be taxed on its net income more than 10 per cent.

This amendment was also defeated by only one vote.

ADVANTAGES OF, AND ARGUMENTS FOR, A GRADUATED TAX ON CORPORATIONS

The theory of a graduated tax on corporations is that such a method will come nearer placing small corporations on an equality with individuals and partnerships in the matter of Federal taxes; that is to say, that a partnership doing business in competition with a corporation should be taxed as nearly equally as possible. Under the present corporation tax laws there is a grave discrimination against the small corporations compared with the partnerships. The graduated tax on corporation incomes is merely an attempt to equalize the burden of partnerships and small corporations.

Again, the tendency of the country at present seems to be toward consolidations of businesses and industries, and there is some question as to whether Congress should encourage that policy. If the small corporations are given an advantage in the payment of taxes over the consolidated capital, it might tend to promote individual effort.

Another advantage of the graduated tax on corporation incomes is that it in a measure takes some recognition of the principle of ability to pay, just as the surtax does in the case of individuals.

If ability to pay is a sound foundation for taxes on personal incomes, then it is a sound foundation for taxes on corporation incomes. If the individual be forced to pay a graduated income tax, why should not corporations also be forced to pay a graduated tax on their incomes? If one principle is sound, then the other is sound. What are corporations? They are groups of individuals, and I contend that the same principle which we apply in imposing an income tax upon individuals should apply to corporations, and if the groups of individuals are honestly organized and honestly managed the rule and principle of a graduated income tax will work out equitably with corporations as with individuals.

The removal of the profits tax and the substitution of a flat corporation income tax is a direct step away from the principle of ability to pay. It is a move directly beneficial to monopolies and trusts, which alone, of all business institutions, are certain of being able to make excess profits when business revives.

All restraint on the making of profits was abandoned forever under the 1921 bill, because no matter how much profit a corporation may make it is to be taxed the same identical rate as a corporation that makes substantially no profit. Competitive business is penalized under the majority amendment.

The small corporations are more likely to reflect individual and personal effort. This should be rewarded as is stimulated by the graduated-tax principle.

Corporation taxes are paid either by the consumers or by the stockholders. Therefore, it may be argued that a reduction of corporation taxes is of some benefit ultimately to the consumers.

If the corporation income tax is paid by the stockholders, an injustice exists that ought to be removed. There are said to be 2,500,000 individuals who return taxable net incomes, and the average rate of tax on their incomes has been reduced to 3.35 per cent, as compared with 3,000,000 stockholders who are virtually taxed on part of their income at the present rate of 13½ per cent.

There are now less than 9,000 individual income-tax payers whose average tax as returned equals or exceeds 13½ per cent of their taxable income. These 9,000 individuals have a net income in excess of $110,000.

The Treasury Department recognized that it was desirable to reduce the tax on the small, closely held corporations, whose situation is substantially that of a partnership, although they do business in corporate form.

In order to give relief to the owners of these closely held corporations with a small income, the Treasury Department recommended that all corporations with incomes of $25,000 or less, and the number of whose stockholders does not exceed 10, be allowed to file their income-tax returns as if they were partnerships, and be taxed on a partnership basis. This recommendation has not been accepted by either the House or the Finance Committee of the Senate.

Mr. President, it seems to me the arguments are overwhelmingly and conclusively in favor of a graduated corporation income tax. It is the only way I know that will do justice, in part at least, to the small corporations.

EFFECT OF CORPORATION CONSOLIDATIONS

The Treasury Department pointed out, in their recent report, that 7.9 per cent of the total number of corporations made 90.1 per cent of the total net incomes reported by all corporations, which means that about 28,000 corporations out of 430,072 corporations filing returns in 1925 made 90.1 per cent of all the profits earned by all corporations. But some other figures are even more startling. The Treasury Department reports that 196 corporations made one-third of all the profits, or net income, reported by all the corporations. This certainly strongly proves the tremendous trend toward the consolidation of wealth and of financial, industrial, and commercial corporations of this country. One is tempted to inquire, How long will it be before 96, instead of 196 corporations, or 9 instead of 96, will be making not one-third, but two-thirds or even more of all the profits of all our corporations?

CONTRAST BETWEEN LARGE AND SMALL CORPORATIONS

Four hundred thirty thousand and seventy-two corporations filed returns in 1925. Only 35 per cent of all these corporations paid any tax at all.

Twenty-five and two-tenths per cent of these corporations showed a profit of not over $2,000, the amount of the exemption then allowed.

Forty-one and three-tenths per cent reported losses.

Therefore, 66.5 per cent of all corporations in the United States paid no taxes in 1925.

Only 25.6 per cent of all corporations reported a net income of over $2,000 and not over $25,000.

Therefore, 92.1 per cent of all corporations in the United States showed a net income of not over $25,000 in 1925.

It is these corporations that will be greatly aided by the recommendations of the minority in favor of the graduated corporation income tax.

OWNERSHIP OF STOCK IN CORPORATIONS

A study of the dissemination of stock among the public is very impressive.

Some may seek to justify the proposed excessive corporation rate by arguing that the corporations represent the great accumulated wealth of the country and hence the discriminatory spread between the 13½ per cent corporation rate and the 5 per cent individual rate simply operates to apportion the aggregate tax burden according to ability to pay. Or it may be argued that those who receive dividends from corporations are persons of wealth who should pay a proportionately large normal tax. Both of these arguments disregard the fundamental principle that apportionment according to ability to pay finds its proper expression in the surtax brackets and rates and not in the flat normal tax. Nevertheless, they are sufficiently plausible to require answer.

Fifteen or twenty years ago it might be said with some approach to accuracy that, by and large, big business was conducted through corporations, and moderate or small sized businesses through partnerships, proprietorships, or associations. But methods of business have undergone profound changes in the last 15 or 20 years, and one of the most remarkable changes has been the greatly increased use of the corporation. To-day almost every enterprise, large or small, except certain types of brokerage houses and financial concerns, real-estate syndicates or ventures, and some large selling agencies are incorporated. It is a matter of common observation that the small stores, shops, restaurants, garages, and retail dealers generally, as well as moderate-sized businesses, are incorporated. Discrimination against corporations in the matter of taxes, therefore, falls heavily on those with little ability to pay.

Consider, first, the effect of the present 8½ per cent discrimination in the case of large corporations:

The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. publicly advertises the fact that it has more than 400,000 stockholders, and that no one stockholder owns as much as 1 per cent of its stock. On January 13, 1927, according to a statement of its president, the General Motors Co. was owned by 57,000 stockholders. A large railroad system—the Pennsylvania Railroad—numbers the checks for each dividend by the tens of thousands. Illustrations might be multiplied indefinitely. The stock registers of our great industrial enterprises are very much like a city telephone directory. The Liberty loan issues instilled in the people a habit of investing in securities, and this habit has been fostered by the banks, trust companies, brokers, and other financial advisers since that time, until to-day the ownership of the great industrial corporations of the country is diffused among the common people to an extent unheard of in the past. Public utilities have found the policy of customer ownership to be a corner stone of sound financing.

There is hardly a large corporation in America to-day that does not encourage its employees to buy its stock. Some corporations practically finance their capital requirements from the savings of their employees. This very revenue bill in section 165 recognizes and encourages the policy of employee ownership by making specific provisions for trusts created by an employer as part of a stock bonus, pension, or profit-sharing plan for the exclusive benefit of some or all of his employees. Under such a plan, by joint contributions of the employer and employee, large sums are made available for investment in the stock of the company, and the employee becomes a part owner of the business for which he works. Representative data collected by the Federal Trade Commission in 1926, with the cooperation of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, discloses some remarkable facts with respect to the stock ownership of corporations.

The commission said:

In the present inquiry schedules requesting data on the number and kinds of stockholders were addressed to a list of 10,000 corporations selected by the Bureau of Internal Revenue in such manner as to be representative not only of size but of each of the 43 industrial groups into which the bureau's returns are listed for tabulation. Returns were received by the commission from 4,367 corporations, with a combined capital stock amounting to over $9,000,000,000, or about 12 per cent of the capital stock of all corporations.

For these 4,367 corporations the average holding of common stock per stockholders was $6,969, while the average of preferred stock was $5,211. The average holdings of common stock per stockholder ranged from $3,273 for electric light and power companies to $18,957 for manufacturers of lumber and wood products, while the average holdings of preferred stock ranged from $1,486 for service corporations to $9,883 for coal-mining companies. Nearly one-third of all the stockholders reported were holders of not more than $500 worth of stock (common and preferred) each. This proportion of small holders to total holders ranged, however, from 11.7 per cent for electric-light companies to 53.8 per cent for petroleum-mining companies. * * *

For corporations reporting the information, the stock holdings of officers, directors, and employees were an important part of the holdings of individuals. In the case of many smaller corporations all of the stock was held by officers and directors. Of the total common-stock holdings, officers and directors held about 10 per cent. They held about 6 per cent of the total preferred stock * * *. The employee stockholders comprised 7.5 per cent of the common stockholders reported and 3.5 per cent of the preferred stockholders. * * * (National Wealth and Income, Senate Doc. No. 126, 69th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 6–7.)

This report, as seen, discloses the remarkable fact that on an average the employees of corporations own almost as much stock as do the executives and directors. Most significant of all, in the present connection, however, is the fact that—nearly one-third of all the stockholders reported were holders of not more than $500 worth of stock each.

These employees, as well as the vast number of investors of moderate means and limited incomes, bear a very large part of the discriminatory burden caused by the excessive corporation rate. On their income from other sources, such as wages, interest, rent, and so forth, they pay a normal tax of 5 per cent or less. On the income from their modest stock holdings they pay a normal tax of 13½ per cent. For the privilege of becoming part owners in these great business ventures, the Government exacts 270 per cent as much tax as it would exact on any other type of investment. The most inexcusable feature of this deplorable situation is that in the case of many of these small stockholders, their incomes are so small that they are not required to pay any direct tax, but nevertheless they must continue to pay indirectly 13½ per cent on every dollar received as dividends regardless of the amount.

There can be no question that the 13½ per cent rate does not apportion the tax according to ability to pay, even in the case of the large corporations. On the contrary, the discrimination falls heavily on hundreds of thousands of persons with small or moderate incomes.

Consider next the case of the small corporation. The Treasury statistics of income for 1925—the last year for which complete data are available—shows on page 13 that 430,072 corporate returns were filed for 1925. Of these returns 177,738 may be eliminated, for they show no taxable income. The remaining 252,334 may be divided into two groups according to corporate income, as follows:

Corporate income	Number of corporations	Per cent of total
$10,000 or less	188,848	75
More than $10,000	63,486	25
Total	252,334	100

Thus, it is seen that three-fourths of the profit-making corporations have small incomes and, it may fairly be presumed, were owned for the most part by individuals with small incomes.

The statistics of income further show that on the average the income of the 189,000 small corporations was less than $2,500. In the aggregate, however, their income amounts to the stupendous sum of approximately $470,000,000, which at 6 per cent represents an investment of $8,000,000,000. Some of these corporations did not have enough income to be subject to the corporation tax. Those who were subject to the tax paid at the rate of 13½ per cent and the burden undoubtedly fell in practically all instances on persons of modest means and very moderate incomes.

It is impossible to accurately compute the extent to which this discriminatory corporation rate falls on the wealthy, and the extent to which it falls on those of limited means and poor people. A rough approximation, however, may be arrived at from the figures in the statistics of income showing the distribution of dividends to stockholders according to income classes. The following table is taken from page 6 of the Statistics of Income for 1925:

Income class of the stockholder:	Dividends reported
Under $1,000	$11,335,943
$1,000 to $2,000	45,905,654
$2,000 to $3,000	86,698,073
$3,000 to $5,000	275,317,122
$5,000 to $10,000	321,289,441
$10,000 to $25,000	731,869,268
Total	1,472,415,501

The total of $1,472,415,501 represents approximately 40 per cent of the dividends received by all income classes. From this it may be properly concluded that something like 40 per cent of the unjust discrimination resulting from the 8½ per cent disparity between the normal rate and the corporation rate falls on persons of moderate and limited incomes.

COMPARISON OF CORPORATION INCOME TAX AND NORMAL TAX OF INDIVIDUALS

I present a table which shows a comparison of corporation income-tax rate with the normal individual tax rate.

If you assume that the corporation income tax comes out of the stockholder, this table illustrates how much larger a tax is paid by a stockholder of the corporation than an individual pays on his income.

The minority recommendation for graduated corporation income tax helps, in part, to correct this particular situation. The majority report practically leaves the inequalities as they are.

[2] The revenue act of 1924 provided for a retroactive 25 per cent reduction of individual taxes for 1923. Profits taxes are excluded to avoid distortion of the comparison. To avoid complicating the table, retroactive reductions are ignored, as not materially affecting the comparisons.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am very glad to yield to the junior Senator from Utah. I wish to say that no man in this body has given more diligent study and labored more assiduously for the perfection of this bill than has the distinguished junior Senator from Utah; in fact, if any medals were to be given to Members of the Finance Committee for their labors on this measure, I think the two Senators from Utah would easily be the recipients of such recognition, because they certainly have given of their time and labor in a most commendable way. I hope the junior Senator of Utah will not think that I am indulging in flattery. I desire to sincerely express my admiration for his perseverance and the long hours of time he has given to this very important subject. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is overgenerous in his words of commendation of my service.

I greatly appreciate his compliments, but fear that I do not deserve the same.

May I add that the Senator from Massachusetts during his service in the Senate has given serious attention to the study of our revenue legislation and to fiscal affairs generally; and no Senator has exhibited a broader knowledge of the principles of taxation and their application than the Senator from Massachusetts.

Before he concludes I should be glad to have him refer to the point which was urged against the excess-profits tax upon corporations and show that the provisions of the House bill dealing with graduated taxes upon corporations with a small annual income, are not subject to the criticisms urged against the principle of the excess-profits tax as found in the war revenue bill. The Senator will recall that the principal objection to the corporate excess-profits tax was based upon the difficulties encountered in determining valuation. The Internal Revenue Bureau encountered real obstacles when it attempted to value property for the purpose of applying the excess-profits tax. The amendment, which is now offered by the minority and which slightly modifies the provisions of the House bill dealing with graduated corporate taxes, does not involve the question of valuation and may be applied without difficulty and enforced without any resulting injustices.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No more than we ask an individual to tell us what the value of his holdings is. I am very glad the Senator made that point, because it shows that we are not trespassing upon the dangerous field, the complicated field, that the Treasury Department complained so much about when we levied the excess-profits tax.

Mr. KING. That is the point I had in mind.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That principle does not apply here at all. It is not necessary for the Treasury Department to fix a valuation upon the amount of capital invested in any corporation. The tax in the proposed amendment is levied on income without regard to invested capital.

Since the Senator addressed me, he will be interested to know that one of the experts of the Treasury Department has informed me that more individuals in this country pay a tax by reason of being stockholders through this tax levied upon the incomes of corporations than all the individual taxpayers in the country. The number of people who make returns as individuals is not as large as the number of people who have to pay an indirect tax as stockholders because of the tax levied upon corporation incomes.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask the Senator one other question, with his permission.

The volume which I hold in my hand, called "Statistics of Income from Returns of Net Income for 1925," published by the Treasury Department, is a mine of statistical wealth and of value to Congress when it undertakes to frame tax measures, especially where it deals with the revenues to be collected from corporations and the taxes imposed upon individuals.

What I desire to ask the Senator is this: In pursuing his investigations to a later date than indicated in the volume to which I have just referred, has he found an increasing tendency upon the part of corporations to consolidate? And if so, has he discovered that in the consolidations and mergers there is substantially a uniform diffusion of stock and to the same extent as in the corporations theretofore found and which have been in some instances called trusts?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think that is true. Is the Senator familiar with the study made by the Federal Trade Commission about the class and number of holders of stock?

Mr. KING. Yes; I am familiar with that. I have the volume before me.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator, then, will remember that it is stated there—I referred to it in an earlier part of my address—that nearly one-third of all the stockholders reported from a study of a special group of corporations were holders of not more than $500 worth of stock each. That is remarkable. The Federal Trade Commission gathered together the lists of stockholders of a given number of corporations, found out what the holdings of each were, and reached the conclusion that nearly one-third of all the stockholders reported were the holders of not more than $500 worth of stock each. Nothing has surprised me more in my economic studies than the extent to which stock is being held by those in limited financial circumstances in this country, and the extent to which employees of industrial plants are buying and holding stocks.

Mr. KING. I have been interested in the observations of the Senator and the lucid explanation which he has made showing the distribution of stock among a large number of stockholders.

May I add that if those in our country who possess great wealth, who organize corporations and are instrumental in bringing about mergers and great considerations, will pursue a course by which there will be a greater diffusion and distribution of the stock of corporations, and no monopolistic effects will be made, much of the prejudice which has justly existed against corporations will be dissipated. I have feared that some corporations would continue their ruthless course against competitors and seek to destroy the small corporations and the competing business owned and conducted by individuals and concentrate in the hands of a limited number of individuals and corporations the wealth owned by the latter.

I believe that my fears are not without foundation. There are trusts and monopolies in our business and industrial life, and they have wrought evil and in many fields destroyed competition. Such monopolistic aggregations should be dissolved and the antitrust laws should be launched against them and effectively enforced until their grip upon the economic life of the people is destroyed. They are a menace to the peace and prosperity of the people. Monopolies are hateful and dangerous, and when they become regnant they will threaten the political institutions of our country. Economics and industry can not be separated from the political field, and political institutions are more or less dependent upon economic and industrial conditions. Those who attempt to differentiate economics and industry from politics and political institutions will find that their efforts are futile.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator never uttered sounder views.

Mr. KING. So it is important that in our political studies we shall study our economic conditions. Legislators and politicians and statesmen may not take the flattering unction to their souls that they can solve political questions and properly deal with them, unless and until they understand economic and industrial questions we may possess civil liberty and political liberty, but soon the crown of liberty will depart if we have industrial or economic servitude. I have been afraid that giant corporations, with their massed capital and mass production, would become so powerful in our industrial and political life that they would destroy competition; and with the destruction of competition there would arise an oligarchy of wealth dominating political institutions and controlling all the avenues in which the people walk.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Apropos of what the Senator has said, my attention has just been called to an article in the Washington Herald of May 11, one of the daily financial articles by Mr. B. C. Forbes, in which he says:

> Again, we are making unprecedented progress in creating a nation of investors. All indications are that the number of individuals of moderate means now interested in stocks is far beyond anything ever before known. Democratization has been at work in this direction. Several millions of employees have been introduced to the idea of stock owning through the action of their employers in making stock available to workers on easy installment payments.

Now, I am going to close, but I want to say just one word to the other side.

If you accept the majority recommendation, you will be reducing the corporation taxes 1 per cent. The chief beneficiaries again will be those corporations that I class, for want of a better name, as the excess-profits-making ones.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. GERRY. You will be simply reducing the corporation taxes to the point where they were before they were raised in the last revenue bill. Is not that the case?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is true; but, of course, the capital-stock tax has been removed. The Senator is correct so far as the normal corporation income tax is concerned.

Mr. President, I want to repeat, however, that the majority bill is not removing the 25 per cent increase made in 1921 in the tax bills of 92 per cent of all the small corporations of the country. The majority are again taking its old position as the protector of big business, the trusts and monopolies most able to pay; and, on the other hand, the small, struggling limited-dividend-earning corporations and their investors of this country are to be penalized further by practically nothing being done to get them back to the tax basis on which they were during the war. At least we should aim to accomplish this end.

I can not see how any Senator or any political party can defend such a policy. Is it any wonder that we sometimes accuse the majority party of not being the real protectors and defenders of business, but of being first and last the champions and protectors of big business?

Mr. President, I am pleading, the minority is pleading, for a square deal to 400,000 competitive corporations that represent the small investments of our people and small industries engaged in the struggle for existence against the great, powerful corporations of this country. We are asking that the small corporations be brought back to a basis where they will enjoy the privileges of the corporation laws, and not have to pay a tax in excess of that paid by individuals and partners.

This is the position we take. I believe the Senate will support our efforts to make this tax bill remove the indefensible injury done in all tax bills since 1921 to our numerous small incorporated businesses and industries.

Before closing my argument, I know of no better way of pointing out the importance of the graduated corporation income tax amendment which the minority proposes than by asking and answering a question.

The minority bill recommends a reduction of about $200,000,000 in the tax on corporation incomes. How will this reduction be distributed between the so-called large and small corporations? The experts of the Treasury inform us that practically 92 per cent of this reduction would go to those corporations that have a net income of over $25,000. This means that practically 8 per cent, or only $160,000, of this enormous reduction will go to the corporations with net incomes of less than $25,000. The minority graduated corporation income tax amendment therefore will very materially assist in distributing this reduction in taxes much more widely and in a very much larger proportion among smaller corporations.

I need not reiterate the additional fact that all of the 430,072 corporations which filed returns in 1925 (66.5 per cent of them, of course, did not in that year pay any tax, as they had either no income or an income of less than the exemption of $2,000) would be benefited very substantially by the minority proposal, except the 8 to 10 per cent of all the corporations which had an income in excess of $18,000 in 1925. They would enjoy for the first time since the war a reduction in taxes; even the 8 per cent large corporations would get a reduction greater than the majority favor, for their proposal is a flat reduction of 1 per cent while the maximum graduated corporation tax of the minority proposes a 10 per cent reduction in this class; the reduction to the smaller corporation is from 8½ per cent to 2 per cent.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, on the calendar there are two bills which have to do with the safety of navigation on the Great Lakes. They are purely regulatory. Navigation is about to open, and an appeal has been made to me that these bills be put on their passage. They have received the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Commerce and should be passed at once.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not any objection to the passage of the bills; but I have been asked by at least half a dozen Senators to allow certain bills on the calendar to be taken up to-day. During the last few days we did not mention the revenue bill, and I told the Senators who asked me that I could not agree that any other bills should be taken up to-day, because I wanted to go on with this bill for at least one day. I ask the Senator kindly not to press his request.

Mr. COPELAND. I am in the fullest sympathy with the Senator. These bills, however, have to do with the safety of navigation. Ordinarily, if small boats were involved, the department itself could make regulations; but in this case it is necessary to have the action of Congress.

The bills have passed the House; they have been duly considered by the Commerce Committee; and I do not think they will involve a minute of discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not opposed to them; but I have stated to the other six Senators who have asked me that I was not going to allow any bill other than the revenue bill to be taken up to-day, because I was going, if I could, to keep this bill before the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sure the Senator, at a proper time, will help me to pass the bills to which I refer; and therefore I will not press the matter now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McMASTER in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am going to take just a few moments of the time of the Senate in answer to a number of questions that were brought up by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The Senator has laid great stress upon the statement that no relief is given to these 400,000 small corporations.

Mr. President, as the Senator says, the House raised the exemption from $2,000 to $3,000, and we have maintained that exemption. That will take care of a greater increase than the 1 per cent that is involved in the Senate amendment supported by the majority, because, instead of deducting $2,000 from their net gains, they are entitled to deduct $3,000. The Senate can see plainly what that would mean in the case of a small corporation making only $5,000 a year. That is a great reduction. In fact, in order that I may not take the time of the Senate unless the Senate really wants to have it done, I have here a table showing what the graduated tax on small corporations would be; and, if there is not any objection and no one wants me to read it, I will ask that it be inserted in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, of course no objection will be made to the Senator putting the statement in the RECORD; but there is a modification that has been proposed or will be proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] touching the graduated tax on small corporations with incomes of less than $15,000 which cures every objection that I have ever heard raised against the proposition. I take it that those figures were based on the House amendment. They would not apply, may I say, to the modified amendment that the Senator from North Carolina will propose to the House provision.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Did the Senator from Mississippi state that the amendment about to be voted on now would eliminate the injustices to one who gets just outside of one of these brackets?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; this would cure that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The amendment has been prepared by experts?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; by the committee's experts and the Treasury experts.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing that this shall go into the RECORD without reading.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no objection to that particular proposition.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRADUATE TAX ON SMALL CORPORATIONS

The provision in question was proposed in order to relieve the tax burden upon small corporations. The Committee on Ways and Means of the House accomplished this by an increase in the credit from $2,000 to $3,000 in the case of a domestic corporation having a net income of $25,000 or less. I have prepared two tables showing the effectiveness of this provision. The first table shows the actual rate of tax, assuming that the rate on corporations is fixed at 12½ per cent, as recommended by the Finance Committee, when the effect of the exemption is considered. This table is as follows:

With normal rate on corporations 12½ per cent

Total corporate net income	Effective rate of tax on total net income, with $2,000 exemption	Effective rate of tax on total net income, with $3,000 exemption	Percentage reduction in corporation's tax by the change
	Per cent	Per cent
$3,000	4.2		100
$4,000	6.3	3.1	51
$5,000	7.5	5.0	33
$6,000	8.3	6.3	24
$7,000	8.9	7.1	20
$8,000	9.4	7.8	17
$9,000	9.7	8.3	14
$10,000	10.0	8.8	12
$11,000	10.2	9.1	11
$12,000	10.4	9.4	10
$13,000	10.6	9.6	9
$14,000	10.7	9.8	8
$15,000	10.8	10.0	7
$16,000	10.9	10.2	6

The second table shows the actual effect upon corporations with net incomes of $25,000 or less when the reduction from the present rate of 13½ per cent to 12½ per cent and the increase in the exemption from $2,000 to $3,000 is considered. This table is as follows:

Total reduction in tax by bill as reported by Finance Committee to corporations with small net incomes

Total corporate net income	Tax, 1926 act	Tax, 1928 bill as reported	Reduction in tax	Reduction in tax
				Per cent
$3,000	$135		$135	100.0
$4,000	270	$125	145	53.7
$5,000	405	250	155	38.3
$6,000	540	375	165	30.6
$7,000	675	500	175	25.9
$8,000	810	625	185	22.8
$9,000	945	750	195	20.6
$10,000	1,080	875	205	19.0
$11,000	1,215	1,000	215	17.7
$12,000	1,350	1,125	225	16.7
$13,000	1,485	1,250	235	15.8
$14,000	1,620	1,375	245	15.1
$15,000	1,755	1,500	255	14.5
$16,000	1,890	1,625	265	14.0

NOTE.—Under the bill corporations with net income in excess of $25,000 all get a reduction of 7.4 per cent by change in rate from 13½ per cent to 12½ per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator, before the Senator from Mississippi began to speak, in the opinion of the Senator should the Senate act on the whole section in passing on the proposed amendment to the provision relating to the income tax on corporations?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think it would make any difference.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are now discussing the question of the reduction of the income tax on corporations according to the amendment offered by the minority. There is a House provision included in that tax providing for a graduated income tax on corporations up to 15 per cent. We want to retain that House provision, but we want to amend it so as to avoid the difficulty and inequity that would be apparent from a sudden jump in the rate of taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say this to the Senator, that if the Senate decides that they want a graduated tax I certainly will agree to the Senator's amendment. There will be no question about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I will offer this amendment now.

Mr. SMOOT. The only question to decide is whether we are going to have a graduated tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. I send the amendment forward as a proposed amendment, which I would like to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 15, line 21, after "section 26," insert a semicolon and the following:

but the tax under this subsection shall not exceed $1,350 plus the amount by which the net income in excess of such credits exceeds $15,000.

On page 15, in lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out in lines 22 to 25, inclusive, and lines 1 to 6, inclusive, on page 16, insert the following:

(b) Taxable income not more than $15,000: If the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 26 is not more than $15,000, then, in lieu of the rate prescribed in subsection (a), the rate shall be—

(1) Five per cent if such amount is not more than $7,000.

(2) Seven per cent if such amount is more than $7,000 and not more than $12,000; but the tax under this paragraph shall not exceed $350 plus the amount by which the net income in excess of such credits exceed $7,000.

(3) Nine per cent if the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided by section 26 is more than $12,000 and not more than $15,000; but the tax under this paragraph shall not exceed $840 plus the amount by which the net income in excess of such credits exceeds $12,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand from hearing the amendment read, the object of the amendment offered by the Senator is to take care of a corporation whose income may be $7,500 or $8,000, so that it will not be penalized in the top bracket, just the same as we have arranged for in the surtaxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the significance of it and the intent of it. The intent of the amendment is simply to relieve against a situation which might require an excessive tax from a man immediately above the $15,000 limit or the $7,000 limit, as the case might be.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not seen the amendment, but from hearing it read I thought that was the object of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. That amendment was prepared by the draftsmen and the experts of the committee and the Senate for the purpose of accomplishing that object. It is very technical, but they advised me that as a matter of fact it would accomplish the purpose of bringing about entire equity in the graduated scale.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt about it, but after hearing it read I wanted to be sure that was the object the Senator had in view. I think the amendment will accomplish that.

Speaking of the smaller corporations and the graduated tax, generally throughout the United States the small corporations make relatively the largest profits that are made. There is no question about that, from all the returns we receive. That is rightfully so, because in the smaller corporations the individuals standing at the head of the corporations are particularly interested in them and give their whole time to them. Of course, it is perfectly natural that they should have and must have a greater profit than the great corporations, such as the railroads.

As to the graduated tax on corporations, in order to save time I am going to call attention to the statement in the majority report on that subject. It is:

The House bill (sec. 13 (b)), in an effort to relieve the tax burdens of small corporations, imposes a graduated tax of 5 per cent, 7 per cent, and 9 per cent upon the taxable net incomes of $7,000, $12,000, and $15,000, respectively. Your committee has stricken this provision from the bill, upon the ground that it can not be supported upon any sound principle of taxation.

The justification for a graduated tax in any case is that it is based upon ability to pay. This is true, generally speaking, in the case of individuals. In the case of corporations, however, the size of the income does not reflect ability to pay. The capital invested in the business must also be taken into consideration. Our experience during the war with the excess-profits and war-profits taxes was such as to counsel us against reintroducing this principle into our tax system. With invested capital eliminated, however, the only possible justification for a graduated tax disappears. A corporation with a $1,000,000 income, which represents an actual earning of only 5 per cent, is certainly in no better position to pay taxes than a corporation with a $15,000 income which represents an earning of 20 per cent. If Mr. Jones invests $1,000 in the $1,000,000 corporation, there is no justification for reducing the fruits of his investment by 12½ per cent, while if he invests the same $1,000 in a $50,000 corporation his income would be reduced by only 5 per cent, 7 per cent, or 9 per cent. Furthermore, the provisions of the House bill open new avenues for tax avoidance by the simple expedient of forming several corporations and distributing their earnings so as to keep them within the low brackets.

Everyone recognizes the justice of a graduated tax on individuals, but when it comes to a corporate body, a corporation, the objections to it stated in this report I wholly agree with, and I think that statement represents the general opinion throughout the United States. Therefore the majority members of the committee decided that the House was wrong in the graduated tax which was placed in the bill on the floor of the House.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Utah desires to be entirely frank in his presentation of this matter, and I wanted to ask him what he thought of the suggestion that the element of personal service enters far more largely into the incomes of the small corporations than into the incomes of the large corporations. The Senator may say that they are allowed to make a reasonable deduction for personal service.

Mr. SMOOT. They are.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that the Senator might say, and say properly, that they are; but the Senator must bear in mind that the total amount of the incomes of these small concerns is relatively so very small that if they should allow the whole amount as a salary, in some instances, it would not much more than compensate the individual owner. Especially is that true of these closed corporations, where the stock is owned by two or three members of a family, where the industry is a very small one. The big corporation, however, has an income that will justify it in allowing special talent, as they call it, expert talent, all that sort of talent, enormous salaries, which are deducted, salaries of $25,000 a year or $50,000 a year. Some of them may go even higher than that. That would not be possible with the small corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. Most of the small corporations fix their own salaries and deduct them, and there have been very few objections on the part of the Government. If the situation were just as the Senator said, if there were an allowance of $100,000—and there is no doubt that in a few cases, such as the United States Steel Corporation or the General Motors Co., such salaries are paid—the percentage of such salaries in proportion to the gains is infinitesimal. It perhaps would not be one-twentieth of what it would amount to in a case such as the Senator has referred to. I have no objection to these small corporations fixing as a salary what a man could earn anywhere in the world, working in the same identical business, I would not care where it was. The department has acted on that theory, and I have heard no complaint. In fact, I know the department has been liberal, and I know that no complaints have come to me as chairman of the Finance Committee. With the increased exemption now from $2,000 to $3,000, there is no little concern in the United States running a corporate business that will suffer under the provisions of this bill.

As to the reduction, the Senator from Massachusetts made a correct statement. Prior to the 1926 law they paid 12½ per cent and in addition a tax upon the capital stock. At the earnest request of the corporations of this country, in the 1926 measure, the capital-stock tax was repealed, and 1 per cent was added onto the corporation tax. As far as the income derived from corporations is concerned, it was almost exactly the same.

As I say in the report, if we could reduce taxes more than the committee bill provides, as far as I am personally concerned, the very first one to be reduced would be the corporation tax. But that can not be done in safety, and therefore we have done all that we felt it is possible to do for those organizations in making it 12½ per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now offer the amendment which I submitted a few moments ago.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, what is the pending committee amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that his amendment be acted upon first. The pending committee amendment is found on page 15, line 19, where the committee proposes to increase from 11½ per cent to 12½ per cent the tax provided for by the House.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that the amendment which I have just offered is in order without unanimous consent, because the effect of my amendment is to change the whole section.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator's amendment applies to paragraph (b).

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill applies to the rate on corporate incomes.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a flat rate.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are proposing, by the amendment which I have offered, to make it a graduated rate up to $15,000. Therefore we are changing the committee amendment to that extent.

Mr. SMOOT. I consented to a vote on the Senator's amendment first, so there is no question about it. The Senator's amendment is to be voted on first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I understood the unanimous-consent request was that we first vote upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina, which he has just offered formally.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Utah has no objection to it?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to a vote on it at all, but the Senator had unanimous consent.

Mr. FLETCHER. I mean to the amendment itself?

Mr. SMOOT. As I understood the Senator, so there will be no misunderstanding, his amendment amends the committee amendment. That is the one we want to vote on first.

Mr. FLETCHER. Are we ready to vote?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. The Senator from Mississippi will understand now that the pending amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina is an amendment to paragraph (b), section 10, tax on corporations, which the House had provided and the Senate committee proposed to strike out.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and we are to vote on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I would like to add a very brief but important statement to what I said a few moments ago. I asked one of the experts of the Treasury Department to inform me what percentage of the reduction proposed by the majority of $200,000,000 upon corporations would go to the small corporations and what percentage to the large corporations. I was informed that about 92 per cent of the $200,000,000 would go to corporations with incomes of more than $25,000 and that only about 8 per cent of the reduction, which would be about $15,000,000, would go to those corporations which we class as the smaller corporations with incomes of less than $25,000. In other words, the great benefit of the proposal of the majority, which eliminates the graduated income-tax provision recommended by the minority would go to the corporations having incomes in excess of $25,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Necessarily so, because they pay all the taxes now. We can not take very much off of corporations that do not pay any taxes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is true, but the large ones do not need it.

Mr. SMOOT. Over 92 per cent is paid by corporations not involved in this at all.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, as I understand now, the pending amendment is the one proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. The way the vote will come, since the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina has been offered in lieu of the Senate committee amendment, is to vote first on that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. HARRISON. Those in favor of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina should vote "yea," and those opposed to it should vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in their report, speaking of smaller corporations, even the Treasury Department recognizes that the small corporation should be given some relief. The Senator from Massachusetts made a very splendid and logical presentation of the matter showing the inequalities against the small corporations, showing that the greater relief would go to corporations of great capital by virtue of the removal of the excess-profits tax and other remedies, and that, during the course of time, the small corporations had been discriminated against.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is perfectly aware that the excess-profits tax hits the small concerns more than it does the large ones.

Mr. HARRISON. The trouble is the Senator will not pay any attention to what those on this side of the aisle say. If he did, he would get right more often.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; he would get on the wrong road.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Massachusetts presented the proposition that there were many corporations in the country that did not make more than 8 per cent and consequently that pay none of the excess-profits taxes. When we took off the excess-profits tax, of course, we helped the prosperous corporation, and by holding to the 12½ or 13½ per cent tax on all corporations we are continuing to discriminate against the corporation that made below 8 per cent and was not one of the prosperous corporations.

The Secretary of the Treasury recognizes that some relief should be given to the smaller corporations because in his report he made this recommendation. It seems the Senate committee has paid no attention to his recommendation, nor did the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

I suggest the following—

Said the Secretary in his report of last October—amending those provisions of the law that apply to the tax on corporate incomes so as to permit corporations with a net income of $25,000 or less and with not more than 10 stockholders to file returns and pay the tax as a partnership at their option. It is estimated that such amendment will result in a loss of $30,000,000 to $35,000,000 of revenue.

That showed that the Treasury Department realized there had been discrimination against corporations whose incomes were less than $25,000. Of course, that is a fallacious recommendation. It will not stand the test and I can understand why the Committee on Ways and Means refused to consider it. However, it shows the bent of mind of the Secretary of the Treasury.

We know that in many of the smaller communities throughout the country people subscribe to stock for some hotel or a baseball club or many other things which they think are for the advancement and development of their town. They subscribe for stock in factories or other industries that might come there. If we get 100 men in a small community to subscribe to the stock of a corporation, the net income of which would be $25,000 or less, operating in competition with a corporation where there were not more than 10 stockholders, we find that the Secretary of the Treasury would give complete relief to the one as against the other, and if there was any relief due either one it ought to go to the latter kind of corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. The object of it was that they could make their returns as a partnership rather than a corporation if they desired to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but that saved the corporation tax, which was a great saving. That showed that even the Secretary of the Treasury recognized that the small corporation should be given some relief.

I can not understand how any Senator can vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina. I know that there might be objection raised to the language which was adopted by the House. It was perhaps hurriedly drafted. It proposes to carry out the right idea, and that is why it received such a tremendous vote in the House. But it did need some polishing, so we have put it through the polishing process and it is now an amendment against which the criticism that was made has been eliminated. The only objection raised before the Finance Committee to this corporation amendment giving some relief to the small corporations was because of the different percentages which were imposed in certain brackets, and it was maintained that when we got over one bracket into the other the discrepancy was so great that it was probably inequitable. That is quite true; but the way it is drawn now clears up and does away with that objection.

Under the bill as it passed the House, if the income in excess of the credits was $7,000 the tax would be 5 per cent of $7,000, or $350. If, however, the net income in excess of the credits was $7,001, the tax would be 7 per cent of such amount, or $490.07, the result being that an increase in income of $1 produced an increase in tax of $140.07.

So under the House bill, if the net income in excess of the credits were $12,000, the tax would be 7 per cent of this amount, or $840, but if the net income in excess of the credits were $12,001, the tax would be 9 per cent of this amount, or $1,080.09, the result being that an increase of $1 in net income would produce an increase in tax of $240.09.

Also under the House bill, if the net income in excess of the credits were $15,000, the tax would be 9 per cent of this amount, or $1,350. If, however, the net income in excess of the credits were $15,001, the tax would be 11½ per cent of this amount, or $1,725.12. Here again the result under the House bill is that an increase of $1 in net income would produce an increase in tax of $375.12.

The amendment now proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and upon which the Senate will now be called upon to vote, clears this difficulty by providing that in each case the tax shall not exceed the tax under the last preceding bracket, plus the amount of the net income in excess of the highest amount included in such preceding bracket. For example, if the net income in excess of the credits is $7,000, the tax would be $350 as under the House bill. If, however, the net income in excess of the credits is $7,001, the tax would be the amount of the tax under the preceding bracket, namely, $350, plus the amount in excess of $7,000, namely, $1, or a total tax of $351, as opposed to the tax under the House bill on the same net income, which, as I have stated, would be $490.07.

Further illustration of the effect of the amendment would be in the case of an income of $15,001, which under the House bill would be 11½ per cent of such amount, or $1,725.12. Under the proposed amendment the tax would be 9 per cent of $15,000, or $1,350, plus $1, or a total tax of $1,351.

That is all I desire to say on the question. Since the tax that would be lost by virtue of these reductions in corporation taxes below $15,000, according to the brackets suggested, we will only lose $24,000,000. I submit that in the interest of the smaller corporations of the country the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina should be adopted.

This amendment goes further even on net incomes of corporations slightly above $15,000, because until the point above $15,000 net income is reached, according to the rule laid down here, the tax will be reduced on income below the 12½ per cent according to the Senate amendment, or 11½ per cent according to the House's action.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 21, after "section 26," insert a semicolon and the following:

"but the tax under this subsection shall not exceed $1,350, plus the amount by which the net income in excess of such credits exceeds $15,000."

On page 15, in lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out in lines 22 to 25, inclusive, and lines 1 to 6, inclusive, on page 16, insert the following:

"(b) Taxable income not more than $15,000: If the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 26 is not more than $15,000, then, in lieu of the rate prescribed in subsection (a), the rate shall be—

"(1) Five per cent if such amount is not more than $7,000.

"(2) Seven per cent if such amount is more than $7,000 and not more than $12,000; but the tax under this paragraph shall not exceed $350, plus the amount by which the net income in excess of such credits exceeds $7,000.

"(3) Nine per cent if the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided by section 26 is more than $12,000 and not more than $15,000; but the tax under this paragraph shall not exceed $840, plus the amount by which the net income in excess of such credits exceeds $12,000."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question. Does the Senator in his amendment take into consideration the amount of capital invested in the corporations affected?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the amendment merely takes into consideration the income derived from corporate operations.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator think it a fair proposition to put an amendment of this kind into the bill without respect to the amount of capital that the corporation may have invested?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do. I think that a corporation that has a large capital and yet is so unfortunate as to make only a small income ought to be relieved.

Mr. COUZENS. Let me give this illustration to the Senator: Let us assume that a corporation has invested $5,000 and makes $12,000; such a corporation would get the benefit of this provision. Is not that correct?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, exactly; just as in the case of an individual who invests a large amount of money and derives a small amount of income from it.

Mr. COUZENS. Assume that a corporation has an investment of a million dollars and makes $20,000. It receives no advantage from this provision.

Mr. SIMMONS. None at all. The tax is graduated up to $15,000.

Mr. COUZENS. I think that the Senator will agree that there can be no equity in that. If a corporation invests a million dollars and makes only $20,000 it gets no advantage from this provision whatsoever, but if it invests $5,000 and makes $12,000 it gets the benefit of this provision.

Mr. SIMMONS. How does the Senator differentiate that from the case of an individual who invests a million dollars and makes only $20,000? He has the benefit of a graduted income tax at a very low rate.

Mr. COUZENS. He certainly has, but he is not engaged in business as a corporation with a specific amount of capital invested; and, as we all know, 99 per cent of the business of this character is done in corporate form.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but an individual may do as much business as a corporation. Many individuals in this country invest a million dollars in their business, just as a corporation may invest a million dollars in its business, and if that individual's income is very small he gets the benefit of the low rate.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true; but a graduated tax on a corporation can not be accurately worked out without a consideration of the amount of capital invested.

Mr. SMOOT. In the case of which the Senator from Michigan just spoke all that the individual would pay would be the normal tax; that is all there would be to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the individual would pay more than the normal tax if he made $20,000.

Mr. SMOOT. An individual pays the normal tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. He pays the normal tax and the surtax also. The normal tax is graduated and the surtax is graduated upon the individual, and it is graduated upon a partnership. We give the man who makes a small income, without any reference to the amount of capital he has invested, a lower rate than the man who, with the same amount of capital, makes a larger income; and I can not see how we can differentiate a corporation from an individual or partnership.

Mr. COUZENS. I point out to the Senator that the cases are not analogous.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; he can go on with his speech if he desires.

Mr. COUZENS. No; I merely wanted to get the Senator's viewpoint. I am not out of sympathy with a graduated tax if it can be graduated all down the line, and have some reference to the amount of capital the corporation has invested.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator knows that we do not graduate income taxes all the way down the line. We graduate the income tax up to $100,000, and when the income exceeds $100,000 we impose a flat tax. The same thing we propose to do in the case of corporations. We graduate the corporation's income tax up to $15,000, and above $15,000 we impose a flat rate, as we do in the case of the individual and the partnership.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that every time we propose to apply the principle of ability to pay to corporations, and suggest a graduated income tax or an excess-profits tax, we are confronted with the claim that it is impracticable. We had to wipe out the excess-profits tax because it was not workable, and we are told that the graduated tax is not workable, which is an admission that we have created something called a corporation to which we can apply no principle that will protect the weak and the struggling industry against the powerful and those that make excess profits.

An individual who engages in business has his tax graduated, and has a surtax applied to his income as it increases, but the moment the cloak of a corporation is put on business you say, "All must be treated alike"; that the small business concern in a corner grocery shall not have applied to its business the principle of ability to pay when it comes to paying taxes.

I protest against the claim that we have created, through our corporation laws, a situation that makes it impossible to levy taxes upon the small business concerns at a lower rate than upon the larger and heavy dividend earning corporations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], which I transfer to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BLEASE. I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to announce that if the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I have been requested to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]; and

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 38, as follows:

So Mr. SIMMONS's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I reserve the right to have a vote upon this amendment when the bill reaches the Senate.

The amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. The next amendment is on page 15, line 19.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 15, line 19, where the committee proposes to strike out "11½ per cent" and insert "12½ per cent," so as to read:

SEC. 13. TAX ON CORPORATIONS.

(a) Rate of tax: There shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation, a tax of 12½ per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits against net income provided in section 26.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Utah explain the action of the committee in this respect, in view of what the Senator has said in his statements heretofore?

Mr. SMOOT. That is very easily explained. I have already said here to-day that if it were possible to reduce taxes further than this bill provided, the corporation tax would be the first one I would reduce; but we can not do it, Mr. President, and keep within the limits of safety on the part of the Treasury of the United States.

I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I understand, then, the Senator from Utah puts his opposition to the amendment offered by the minority solely upon the ground that there is not sufficient money in the Treasury to justify so great a reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. I may say that the amendment means a loss to the Treasury of $82,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I ask what amendment the Senator refers to?

Mr. SMOOT. The committee amendment which makes the corporation tax 12½ per cent. The House made it 11½ per cent; and the minority members of the committee, the Democratic members, wanted it left at 11½ per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does that make a difference of $82,000,000, did the Senator say?

Mr. SMOOT. Eighty-two million dollars.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3456) allowing the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army, to the medical officer assigned to duty as personal physician to the President, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

POSITION OF UNITED STATES FLAG

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y., May 8, 1928.

MY DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: I have read of your resolution abolishing the flying of the chaplain's flag above the United States flag on ships during divine services.

At a conference at Washington, before the House Judiciary Committee, some three or so months ago, when the Brand bill was under consideration, the authorities of the Navy Department attending that conference said the Navy would willingly give up their practice in order to conform with the rules of the flag code then being considered.

That Brand bill never got very far, but the inclosed brochure shows that 112 patriotic and fraternal societies have adopted the inclosed flag code (and which will be in print within a few days complete) where it says that nothing shall fly above the flag of the United States of America.

These 112 societies represent practically all in the United States so that you may know the country as a whole is in sympathy with your contention.

Yours very truly,

GRIDLEY ADAMS,
Chairman National Flag Code Committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wanted that letter from Mr. Gridley Adams read into the RECORD at this time so that Senators may know what is going on in the country regarding the use and abuse of the American flag. I am going to address the Senate on this subject again in a few days, and ask for the consideration and passage of my resolution, which if adopted, will hereafter prevent the flying of any foreign flag or any other flag, at any time above the United States flag. Certainly the Roman cross should not fly above it. I think that is a question which we ought to determine now. There should be no hesitancy on the part of American Senators to declare themselves on the side of the American flag. One other thing, and I am going to take but a moment, because I am anxious to have a vote on this tax bill. I hold in my hand the report of the hearings of the special Senate committee investigating and examining into the slush funds or financial contributions to presidential candidates. This is a report of the investigation made in New York just a day or two ago, where Governor Smith himself testified.

Governor Smith's testimony is amusing, misleading, and mystifying. Anyone who will read it with a discerning mind will get the impression that the Governor is trying to cover up things, and that he is pleading ignorance about practically everything and trying to get away from responsibility for what is going on in his campaign for the highest office in the country. He is dodging and evading and does not seem to know anything about his campaign. Whether they have asked him to assume that innocent or ignorant attitude or not, I do not know, but I want to tell the Senate this, that in the evidence disclosed already in this investigation we have another Frank Smith case before the Senate and the country in the matter of campaign contributions for Governor Smith. The governor's campaign manager is on the great and powerful Public Utilities Commission of New York, appointed by Governor Smith. He is the man selected to manage Governor Smith's campaign. He is the head of the organization that is now conducting Governor Smith's campaign. That man's name is George R. Van Namee. He has a man by the name of Kenny, of New York City, as a coworker, in the matter of obtaining campaign contributions, and Kenny is a big contractor in New York City. I understand that he and those he represents do millions and millions of dollars' worth of business in New York State and City every year. And that he and his associates obtain permits and franchises from New York State and City from Governor Smith and Mayor Walker.

Senators, this presents an ugly and serious situation to us and to the country. If Governor Smith can name as his campaign manager, or if he permits to act as his campaign manager, whether he selected him or not, the man he appointed for a 10-year term on the Public Utilities Commission of New York State, he places himself in a bad light and in a very reprehensible position before the right-thinking men and women of the country.

Mr. Kenny, the evidence shows, gave $20,000 to this man Van Namee, who is running Smith's campaign, and the testimony shows that he has loaned him $50,000 in money to be used in the interest of Governor Smith. This is just one contractor out of all the contractors they have in New York City. If that is the situation, and if that tells of Kenny's contributions alone, it gives an idea of how much the contractors up there will have to give to the Smith manager before the campaign is over. On the other hand, if Kenny, the friend of Governor Smith, is the agent of Van Namee, member of the New York Public Utilities Commission, is to go out and get these funds to be used in the campaign of Governor Smith, he is in position to hold up and collect large campaign contributions for Governor Smith from every contractor and corporation in New York City and State. This use and abuse of official position and power in the hands of Governor Smith and Mayor Walker to raise campaign funds to be used by Governor Smith or his friends to obtain the nomination for the high and honorable office of President of the United States merits and should receive the scorn and condemnation of patriotic Americans everywhere.

Think of it, Senators! Kenny, the big contractor, going out from Governor Smith's campaign headquarters in New York City calling on contractors and corporations for contributions in the name of Van Namee, of the Public Utilities Commission of the State of New York, and Mayor Walker, of New York City! He is the man who issues permits, and so forth. It is like a judge of a court with hundreds of cases, civil and criminal, pending for trial before him, sending a friend to all of those who had cases in his court asking them to contribute money for a campaign fund being raised to help reelect him. Will the Democrats of the Nation put the stamp of their approval upon such a corrupt and disgraceful perversion of official place and power? No; they will not! Are they ready to turn over to Governor Smith and the Tammany machine that I have just mentioned the leadership of a party that has fought graft and corruption always and been a terror to crooks and criminals since her birth time? No; they are not! I do not believe that one-twentieth of the money raised and expended in behalf of Governor Smith's race for President has been made known to the Senate committee or to the public. Governor Smith's manager told the committee that they had taken in $103,000. No doubt the Tammany Tigers have laughed themselves sick about that.

He also told the committee that there were a number of people who had told him that they would give Governor Smith any amount of money that he needed. Remember they were talking to a member of the public utilities commission appointed by Governor Smith. Verily this man Van Namee is not without "go-getting" influence, to obtain money from those whose business activities are under his scrutinizing eye and power in the State of New York. Next the testimony before the Senate committee shows that Governor Smith's campaign headquarters in New York City are at the Biltmore Hotel. The governor said so. He was asked how many rooms were in use by his campaign committee. He said he did not know, that he had not been in there. Think of that, the governor living in the hotel, headquarters opened up there to manage his campaign for the Presidency, and he has not been there. Strange indeed! I trust that I will not be accused of being intolerant for saying that. Either Senator BRATTON or one of the other members of the committee asked the governor if the New York Central Railroad Co. did not own that hotel. He "thought" they owned the property. Of course the "property" means the hotel, but he said it was under the management of a Mr. Bowman. What difference did that make? Somebody asked him if the rent of all those high-priced rooms was not given as a contribution to his presidential campaign, and he said he did not know. Strange indeed!

Then the committee asked Governor Smith, "Who managed your campaign in California?"

"I do not know. I do not know anything about it."

"Who managed it in Iowa?"

He said he did not know. He even declared that he did not know anybody in Iowa, not even the distinguished senior Senator, Mr. STECK, or Senator BROOKHART. He finally said that he did know Wilbur Marsh and Wilbur Marsh is the fellow who went back on the Senator from Missouri, Mr. REED. Somehow or other they had gotten Wilbur Marsh over into their camp. I have had nothing to do with the Reed campaign, but when I was speaking up in Iowa last summer—I made 8 or 10 speeches in that State—many people told me the State would go for the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. At every place I spoke in the State I was told by a great many people that REED would certainly defeat Smith—that was before Governor Smith's public utilities commissioner of New York got busy in Iowa.

Governor Smith said he did not know who managed his campaign in Iowa, and he did not know who managed his campaign in California, where they spent $41,500. He either has a very obedient and convenient memory or he is very careless and indifferent to what is being done in his interest.

He did say finally after it was over, I understand, that Senator Phelan—a prominent Roman Catholic—had something to do with it. Somebody reminded him that Dockweiler—another of his faith—had something to do with it, and he said yes, he believed he had heard something about that. His testimony was most noncommittal and disgustingly evasive.

Mr. President, just such a ridiculous attitude was assumed by Newberry, of Michigan, who bought a seat in the Senate. Newberry disclaimed personal knowledge, as Governor Smith does, of money raised and expended in his behalf. In that case, John Newberry, a brother, was the Van Namee in the case. But Newberry for doing in a State what Governor Smith is doing in the United States was driven out of the Senate. The Roman Catholic political machine of New York is in action. The power of official position in city and State is employed to corruptly procure the office of President of the United States for Governor Smith, of New York.

This case of Governor Smith's is on all fours with the case of Frank Smith, of Illinois, who was denied a seat in the Senate because he used his office to financially benefit Insull, who was contributing to his, Frank Smith's, campaign fund for election to the Senate, and Smith, on the public utilities commission, was granting the requests of Insull to raise the rates on citizens who were obliged to use Insull's light and power, Insull giving him money to carry on his campaign, and he giving judgments favorable to Insull on the public utilities commission to reimburse Insull and pay him back many times over the amount that he had given Frank Smith.

Mr. President, we owe it to ourselves and to our country to repudiate, condemn, and cast out forever such despicable, disgraceful, and corrupt practices.

Now, we are told that Governor Smith's man, Van Namee, and his contractor friend, Kenny, are going out and holding up the contractors and business men in New York City and State to raise an enormous campaign fund to buy the Democratic presidential nomination for Governor Smith, the head of the Roman Catholic political machine. I call upon the Senate investigating committee to go to the bottom of this thing. Call Mr. Kenny back and ask him, "To what extent do your contracts go in New York City and State? How much money do you make out of or handle on your contracts obtained through Governor Smith or the city of New York under Tammany's rule?" I suggest that they summon Mayor Walker and every big contractor and corporation head in New York City and ask what they have been requested to do in the way of contributions. That ought to be done at once.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] made a good fight in this body attacking the grafters and the corruptionists. I would like to have him give his attention to this most recent corrupt attack upon the safety and security of our American institutions. He knows how to do it as well and perhaps better than any Senator in this body. He has ably and forcefully prosecuted certain grafters and corruptionists, and I want him to come forward now and aid in exposing graft and corruption in the camps of both Democratic and Republican candidates for President.

Before I close let me say that I want the committee to ask Mr. Hoover why he sent $27,000 into California when he had no opposition. Was he afraid they would beat him, even when he had no opposition?

I will have something more to say in a few days on this subject.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an article appearing in to-day's issue of the New York Times.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTHERN VIEW OF SMITH—GOVERNOR'S VOTE-GETTING CAPACITY ONLY ONE POINT IN HIS FAVOR

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

From the standpoint of a southern Democrat the following are to my mind sufficient reasons why Gov. Alfred E. Smith should be the Democratic nominee for President:

First, his undoubted vote-getting capacity. He has no superior as a campaigner. I used to think that the name of Smith, Jones, or Brown was a handicap, but one forgets the name when he thinks of the winning personality of the New York executive. His climb by his own efforts from humble surroundings thrills and fires the imagination. Again, the pronounced fear of Republicans, as manifested by their persistent efforts to prevent his nomination. The Republicans are as active as the ultradrys and those affected by religious prejudice. Next comes his undoubted leadership, as demonstrated by his conduct of affairs of the great State of New York. And then there is his unflinching courage and his unassailable honesty.

When it comes to his religion, anyone who stops to think must realize that a man's church affiliation is a matter almost entirely of inheritance or environment. Governor Smith is a Catholic because he learned that religion at his mother's knee, just as those of us who are Protestants, are Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, or Baptists for the same reason. Moreover, nothing was ever gained by sidestepping an issue, and if the religious issue has to come let it come now. When I feel that Governor Smith is a far better Catholic than I am a Protestant, I hope I have the charity not to hold against him his sincere devotion to his own church simply because I may hold a lesser devotion for mine. Again, there are some 16,000,000 Catholics in the United States, and it would be difficult to persuade them, if Smith is denied the nomination, that it has not been done because of his religious faith, and it appears to me that the Catholic Democrats of the North and East have the same right to be considered as the Protestant Democrats of the South.

Turning to the fact that Governor Smith is personally opposed to the Volstead Act and is commonly accounted a wet, in so far as his candidacy—standing as he does personally for the modification of the Volstead Act—will be a test of the attitude generally on the subject of prohibition, it would seem that the sooner this test is made that much the better. Let me repeat, no good ever comes from evading an issue.

I have no fear of Smith's ability to carry the South. It is possible that he may not receive as large a popular vote as did Wilson, but in my opinion the entire electoral vote of the South will be found in the Smith column. Finally, no candidate that either party can name will make such a popular appeal as will Governor Smith, and his able guidance of the Empire State of New York justifies the confident belief that he will measure up fully to the dignity and responsibility of the office of President of the United States.

ROBT. K. BROCK.

FARMVILLE, VA., May 10, 1928.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has referred to the United States flag, but I think there is something greater in connection with that flag to which he might call attention than flying it under a certain pennant when religious service is being held. I refer to it being placed in so many common, ordinary places, and in so many business places.

It used to be that people reverenced the flag. I have seen old men, who, as they would pass it, would salute it. I have seen other men who would take their hats off when they passed an American flag. But to-day if some little parade comes into a little country town, everybody sticks out an American flag. People have gone to the extent of having holes in the sidewalks, and there will be an American flag on a staff every few feet. They use it on jitney busses, putting a United States flag on front of the bus. Sometimes they will have five or six. Grocers stick them up on their wagons. They pin them on horses' heads.

I think what we should do would be to have some kind of a regulation, issued from some source, providing when the American flag shall be used, and for what purpose it shall be used. The practice of letting people use it for all kinds of purposes and on all sorts of occasions should be discontinued. I could cite some more common instances of places where it has been abused.

I think, instead of fussing about the religious proposition, we ought to get together and pass some law, or adopt some rule, or have a regulation brought forth from some source, providing when the flag shall be used, as it used to be in the olden days. Now, it has gotten so that many use it for advertising purposes, or any other kind of purpose.

Very much the same applies to the medals we bestow. I think it will be so after a while that if a fellow swims Bush River down in South Carolina, a stream about 15 or 20 feet wide, if he makes it without missing a stroke, I will be asked to come and pin a medal on him for swimming over the river. If a fellow runs and jumps over what is called the river, he will get a medal for it.

It is getting so that if a man flies, no matter where he goes, he is given a medal, something is stuck on him. After a while it will be so that deserving people will not want these medals.

One was conferred on Mr. Lindbergh, for whom I have the highest admiration. I expect to see this very Congress ask him to give it up. I was the only Senator in the Chamber who protested against the giving of that service medal, because it is a medal which is supposed to be won like the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] won it. It is supposed to be won by men of that character on the battle field, men who fought for it, risked their lives for it at a time when their country was at stake and not for experimental mercenary purposes, simply to be used for advertising. Yet we have got so we deliver these medals in that way. Yet, what does anyone suppose Senator WARREN to-day—and I say this without having talked to him about it—thinks of the medal that was handed him for a service for which he should have had it? I say that although he was fighting my people, he deserved it. Does anyone think he can hold that medal to-day as sacred as he held it before we began giving it to everybody, to somebody who happened to jump across a creek or fly in a balloon or some fellow that happened to knock down some man for insulting his wife?

I think my friend from Alabama should turn his course a little bit. If the flag of the Christian religion flies above the American flag, if it truly represents the religion of Jesus Christ and His Divinity, let it fly, because long after these people and this Nation shall have passed away that religion will live, and I thank God that that is true.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 15.

Mr. SMOOT. May we have the amendment stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, line 19, the committee proposes to strike out "11½ per cent" and insert "12½ per cent," so as to read:

(a) Rate of tax: There shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation, a tax of 12½ per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits against net income provided in section 26.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, this is perhaps the most important amendment that the Senate will be called upon to vote. I desire to recall briefly the situation.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], as I read to the Senate in the beginning of the discussion, stated that he would favor a $300,000,000 tax reduction. If this amendment, put in by the House, reducing the corporation tax from 13½ to 11½ per cent, together with the other reductions proposed by the majority, shall be adopted, it will not carry a tax reduction of $300,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes!

Mr. HARRISON. The trouble about it is that the Senator makes figures, but he does not base them on correct facts.

Mr. SMOOT. It is $203,000,000, the original reduction, plus $24,000,000——

Mr. HARRISON. The 11½ per cent provision does not carry it to $203,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The $203,000,000 is the amount originally provided for. The Senate has just added $24,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; against the advice and over the protest of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. That amount, together with the $82,000,000, which the Senator from Mississippi now wants, would mean $309,000,000, and yet the Senator from Mississippi says it is not $300,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The loss in revenue, if the rate is reduced to 11½ per cent, will be $165,000,000. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. The difference between 11½ per cent and 12½ per cent is 1 per cent, and that means $82,000,000. That is what I said to the Senator. There was $24,000,000 just voted, and with the $82,000,000, plus the $203,000,000 reduction, that makes a total of $309,000,0000.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator knows that is not the way to figure the proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it is the way, because the bill as reported to the Senate carried $203,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator denied what the House did with reference to capital-stock transfers, and he denied what the House did with reference to dues. He did not want to allow this $24,000,000 reduction in graduated taxes. Now, we want to reduce the corporation rate to 11½ per cent, which would mean $84,000,000 more than the Senate committee provided for.

Mr. SMOOT. Those items were not involved in the $203,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit if the Senator will add up what the Senate has already done and then figure the loss by virtue of a 2 per cent reduction, as is now proposed in the corporation tax, it will not come to $300,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is wrong.

Mr. HARRISON. Let the Senator add up the figures and see.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 4 of the report these are the amounts of reduction stated: Corporation taxes, $82,000,000; corporation exemption, $12,000,000; readjustment of surtax brackets, $25,000,000; automobile taxes, $66,000,000; admission taxes, $17,000,000; cereal-beverage tax, $185,000; wine tax, $930,000; foreign-built yachts, $10,000; a total of $203,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, $203,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right. Now, we have a loss of $24,000,000, which the Senate just voted, and, as I said, the Senator wants to take off $82,000,000 more, which would make a total of $309,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has added and taken into consideration some $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 of surtaxes that we have not yet considered at all.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator said that with the amendments which had been offered it would be less than $300,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. We have not considered all the amendments yet. We have not considered the surtax proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question that the Senator does not want to make any change in that.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, we have made a change in that.

Mr. SMOOT. Not as to the amount.

Mr. HARRISON. It is about the same amount.

Mr. SMOOT. So the Senator was wrong when he said it was less than $300,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Senator is not wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. The figures will speak for themselves. I insist that it is $309,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. It is $309,000,000 according to the Senator's own figures, but he takes into consideration $24,000,000 that we just put on over his protest.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Even with those figures it would be only $285,000,000 reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the Senator going to vote to put that $24,000,000 back?

Mr. HARRISON. Indeed, I am not.

Mr. SMOOT. No; certainly not.

Mr. HARRISON. Is the Senator going to vote with us to maintain it?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am not.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sorry.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator ought not to try to take it off.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator must concede that the Treasury will stand for a tax reduction of $300,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That was an estimate.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and the Treasury Department have given us estimates for seven years and every time they have estimated they have been wrong from $100,000,000 to more than $500,000,000. The argument the Senator from Utah has presented here in the consideration of the tax reduction bill is the same that he presented in 1921, in 1924, and in 1926, when revenue bills were before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. It was an estimate at that time, but now we have waited until after the March 15 payments are in, and we know what they are. It is not much of an estimate now.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; the Senator has said that every time. The Treasury estimates with him are always correct. They were not correct and they have not been correct. They were wrong seven times out of seven during the last seven years. I can not see much reason for believing them to be correct this time. Everybody knows that we have a surplus in the Treasury of over $400,000,000 from this year's taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. This bill has nothing to do with the coming year's taxes.

Mr. HARRISON. We have that surplus. We do not propose to disurb it, but let it be carried over so that if there is any doubt raised or any uncertainty as to the amount of the tax reduction, we will have at least that amount, under the Senator's bookkeeping process, to take care of any deficit. But there will be no deficit in the Treasury.

The Treasury said in 1921—and I must repeat this in order to make any impression on the Senator from Utah—that it would stand for a reduction of $372,000,000. Both Houses of Congress ignored that recommendation and passed a bill which carried $663,000,000 reduction, and yet, notwithstanding that fact, there was an enormous surplus piled up in the Treasury. The amount of surplus was $309,000,000. In 1924 the Treasury Department recommended a reduction of $323,000,000 and said it would not stand for any more of a cut than that amount. Congress passed a tax reduction bill carrying a reduction of $519,000,000, nearly $200,000,000 more than the Treasury said they would stand for, and yet with that great reduction there was piled up in the Treasury a surplus of $505,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That was Republican prosperity.

Mr. HARRISON. And yet the estimates to-day show that the returns from corporation profits are just as big as they were last year or the year before that, and the Senator from Utah undertook to rise in his place here and said it was an unusual situation and prophesied a reduction in it the next year.

Mr. SMOOT. The whole bill, I will say to the Senator, is based upon Republican prosperity continuing.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, let us hope some kind of prosperity will continue. In 1926 the Treasury recommended a cut in taxes of $300,000,000. Congress reduced the taxes $422,000,000. Yet, notwithstanding that, there was piled up in the Treasury a surplus of $607,000,000.

With these facts staring them in the face, the Senator and his committee have the audacity to try to make the American people believe that the Treasury's estimates are correct. Here it is in May, 1928, and on the returns which were made in March they say they are certain and accurate. The Senator knows that many thousands—I may say most—of the taxpayers filed in March only partial returns. Some taxpayers were given extensions until the 15th of May and have not paid anything yet or reported at all; and yet the Senator says "On the face of the returns that are made we know that the estimates at this time are more correct than ever before." We submit that the Treasury Department is wrong in its estimates, that the Government will stand for a reduction of at least $400,000,000, but to be on the side of conservatism, to raise no question of doubt about it, we of the minority have proposed a program which carries about $300,000,000 reduction.

Here is the United States Chamber of Commerce, just adjourned after its meeting in Washington, composed of hundreds of thousands of members comprising business men and leaders in business throughout the country. Every chamber of commerce and board of trade is a member of it. Only yesterday they passed a resolution, which I asked to be incorporated at the close of my remarks, asking for a reduction of the tax on corporations and criticizing and condemning the policy of the administration for levying these high taxes on the American people and drawing from them more than is necessary to run the Government economically, piling up an enormous surplus in the Treasury, taking it to pay off the national debt so that certain favored groups in the country, who have bought Italian bonds and French bonds and Austrian bonds, may in time make their application to get a cancellation of our foreign debt and influence their bonds to go up.

That is what is behind the proposition. Why not be fair with all the American people? Why do they not show enough statesmanship to draw their pattern and frame their fiscal policy so that these great surpluses will not pile up and so they will only levy so much tax on the American people as will pay, within a reasonable time and in an orderly way, pay off our national debt and meet every emergency and demand of the Government to run it in an economical way, without all of this uncertainty and doubt and hypocrisy and deception that has been practiced upon the American people for the last seven years?

I say to Senators on the other side of the Chamber that they do not fool and they have not fooled the United States Chamber of Commerce, the business people. Their representatives appeared before the Committee on Finance, and the Senator from Utah squirmed in his seat. They brought there Mr. Mills, whom they took from the House and put in as Undersecretary of the Treasury, in order that he might protest and join in combat with the United States Chamber of Commerce. I doubt not that every influence—and it is great—that could be brought to bear by the Treasury Department was brought into play upon the members of the chamber of commerce and particularly those higher up in that organization, to keep them from making an issue out of this question and to prevent them passing these resolutions; but the Republican policy has been so palpably wrong that not even the United States Chamber of Commerce could be induced to change its position.

Mr. President, the Democratic Party has never stood as the champion of big business in this country; it does not now do so, even though the Republican majority in a sneering, cynical way have tried to make some believe that we are here to defend solely the corporations. The Democratic Party believes in fair play to the American people; it believes in giving a fair deal to every legitimate industry in the country. We believe that the corporations which are conducting themselves within the law ought to be given some tax reduction just as it is given to individual taxpayers. We have fought to reduce, and we have demanded of Senators on the other side of the Chamber and have finally forced them to reduce, the taxes of the individual income taxpayers of America.

We have fought to eliminate normal taxes and surtaxes upon millions of American taxpayers. And we have forced reduction of surtaxes upon every class. We have and always will stand for the greatest relief to those who need it more, but we are not against legitimate business, it matters not how large it may be. During all this time, what has happened to the corporations?

May I say to Senators on the other side of the Chamber, even though they picture corporations as soulless, they are made up of the millions and millions of American citizens who own stock in those corporations. Under modern business methods people in my State own stock in corporations thousands upon thousands of miles away. Widows and orphans invest their earnings and their possessions in such corporations. Those corporations deserve fair treatment just as much as the individual deserves just treatment.

Let us trace the taxes that have been imposed upon corporations. The tariff act of August 1, 1909, instituted an excise tax with respect to carrying on business by corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies. That was the first effort ever made to impose an excise tax. The income tax law had been held unconstitutional, and this was the way they tried to reach corporation income. That tax was equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received from all sources during the year, exclusive of dividends. That act remained in force until the enactment of the 1913 tariff act. Meanwhile the Supreme Court had upheld the constitutionality of the income tax law. Section 2 of the act of 1913 imposed an income tax on corporations instead of the excise tax imposed by the law of 1909. That was the first time an income tax had been levied on corporations. The rate, however, was continued at 1 per cent; it was not increased; and only one return was required for the year 1913. The rate of the tax was the same, and otherwise the excise tax law and the income tax law were much alike, the income tax law being a trifle broader.

The next time the law was changed was by the act of September 8, 1916. The tax was first imposed in 1909; it was retained in 1913, and then in 1916 the rate was increased to 2 per cent on the net income of corporations. Then came the revenue act of 1917, when we began to prepare for war and to meet the emergencies of the war which was then impending. That act imposed an additional tax on corporations of 4 per cent, making the total tax rate at that time 6 per cent in addition to the excess-profits tax which was levied by that act for the first time on individuals, partnerships, and corporations.

The revenue act of 1918—the war tax law—levied a corporation tax of 10 per cent. By that time the tax on corporations had been increased from 1 per cent in 1909 to 10 per cent in 1918. Then followed the revenue act of 1921, which continued the 10 per cent tax on corporations, as in the 1918 act, for that year, but for each year thereafter the tax was to be raised to 12½ per cent. I call attention to the fact that in the year 1921, three years following the war, after the war had been over for that length of time, and the Republican Party controlled the American Government, it was then that they raised to 12½ per cent the corporation tax, which only 11 or 12 years before had been 1 per cent.

I may say, however, in citing the history of the corporation tax that the reason given for the increase to 12½ per cent was that the excess-profits tax, while continued for the year 1921, was thereafter repealed. The credit allowed the corporations by the act of 1921 was $2,000.

The 1924 act did not materially change the corporation tax, but in 1926 the tax was increased to 13½ per cent. Here is where we come to this modern order of statesmanship, led by the Senator from Utah, who now tries to thwart the plans of the minority, and to restrain us in our efforts to reduce the tax on the corporations of the country to 11½ per cent. It was on his motion that the corporation tax was raised from 12½ per cent to 13½ per cent. He said the other day that the reason for it was that we were going to eliminate the capital-stock tax and in order to make good the loss which would thereby accrue we should increase the corporation tax to 13½ per cent.

The Senator at that time was just as wrong in his figures and just as misleading in his estimates as he is to-day. To me, Mr. President, it is one of the surprises of the age that on this issue he can hoodwink and cement together on his side of the aisle Senators who have talked progressivism and Senators who have stood in their tracks for more than 40 years and are known as the stand-pat crowd. It is rumored that there is an agreement on the other side with those who do not want the question of the estate tax brought up and that tax repealed. If the so-called progressives will vote with the "old guard" against giving relief to the small corporations, the relief which was unanimously decreed should be given to them by the Republican membership in the House of Representatives—aye, by the united membership of the House of Representatives—the leaders on the other side are willing to agree not to try to repeal the estate tax. We will see before this contest is over just what is going to happen. We will know how long this well-ordered agreement will live. We will see who is going to keep the faith over there and how long peace and harmony will reign on the other side of the aisle.

Ah, but the Senator from Utah, who now prates against this reduction in the corporation tax, said in 1926 that we were going to eliminate the capital-stock tax; that because of that action we would lose $93,000,000, and in order to make it up we would have to increase the corporation tax to 13½ per cent. He stated at that time that that was the reason for the increase in the corporation tax. He denied it the other day; but the RECORD is before me, and I can quote it to him if I can keep him in his seat long enough while I am discussing him and this question. I cited from the actuary, Mr. McCoy, a statement that, in view of the general business expansion of that year, we would obtain from the corporation tax at the then prevailing rate of 12½ per cent $120,000,000 more than we had obtained the preceding year, and that if we increased the corporation tax to 13½ per cent, because of the increased business activities of the country we would collect from the corporation tax over $200,000,000 more than we had collected the previous year. With a $93,000,000 loss because of the repeal of the capital-stock tax and more than $200,000,000 obtained from the increase in the corporation tax, there would be left a margin, paid by the corporations over and above what they had paid during the preceding year, of $120,000,000. Those are the facts.

Senators who sit before me now know they are the facts. If the Senator from Utah were in his seat now and should deny the statement, I would read from the discussion which took place at that particular time. Yet it is said the corporations of the country should not now be given some relief in the form of tax reduction.

Mr. President, if the American people would open their eyes and if they could fathom the innermost intentions of some men who are leaders in the public life of this Nation, there would be almost a political revolt. Mr. Mellon and the crowd that work with him have their eyes fixed singly all the time to the reduction of the surtax. That is what they want. Why? Because they know that while on the dividends from stocks of corporations they pay no normal tax on their individual income aside from the stock dividends they do pay the normal tax as well as the surtax. Yet the Senator from Utah, in speaking some months ago, employed a phrase which I will read. The Senator from Utah sometimes make a good speech, and sometimes makes a correct statement as to figures. Of course, they are only on rare occasions. This was one. The trouble is that the Senator forgets one year what he said the year before, and the Senator tells the American people one day what he is going to do, and he does just the opposite the next day. Some of these days they are going to find out the Senator from Utah, as we on this side and you over there, if you know it, already have found, that so far as figures are concerned he is not reliable.

Here is what the Senator said he was doing to do; and this was just in June of last year:

I think the tax bill—

is a very important thing, and that taxes ought to be reduced to the extent of $260,000,000 to $300,000,000.

Here we take his advice, and try to do it; and he rises on the floor of the Senate and, with the power that he wields, he protests and restrains us.

That is not all he said—and the revision ought to be effected by February 1.

He says:

The first thing that should be reduced is the corporation tax, from 13½ to 12 per cent.

He says 12½ per cent is as far as we can go. Why did the Senator say in last June that the first reduction of taxes to be made should be given to the corporations, and at least that they should be reduced to 12 per cent? Now, when we stand here fighting to give them 11½ per cent, as the House of Representatives unanimously did, the Senator says, "You are trying to destroy the Treasury of the Government." So he went back on that statement.

Now, let us see what other statements he made.

The next thing the Senator stands for is the abolition of admission and so-called nuisance taxes. Why, we took up a whole day here, and the Vice President came near getting into political trouble again, because on the amendment that was offered the vote was 40 to 40, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], in order to embarrass the Vice President, got up and said that the Vice President ought to vote; that he was trying to shirk his duty on that particular proposition.

Ah! it is wonderful what politics does to people. One day they are with somebody and the next day they are against him. I do not know whether or not the intention of the Senator from Pennsylvania was to embarrass the Vice President as once he was embarrassed on another close vote; but I submit that the Senator from Utah, who last June said he was for taking off all admission taxes, fought this week our effort to take them off and defeated us by calling in some Senators who had not been here when the discussion was going on. At that we were defeated by only two or three votes.

That is the record. It makes my heart bleed to have to tell the Senate about it, but I have to do it.

Now, let us see what else the Senator from Utah said.

As I have stated, the Senator said he stood for the abolition of admission and so-called nuisance taxes; but when we tried to abolish the capital-stock-issue tax, the capital-stock-transfer tax, and tax on club dues he thwarted our plans. He would not permit us to do it.

Then next there was to come a reduction in income taxes on incomes between $15,000 and $60,000; but since the Senator made that statement, he standing for a reduction in income taxes on incomes between $15,000 and $60,000, he went up to see the Secretary of the Treasury and they talked together, and then he got up another amendment, and he and his colleagues on the committee brought in that amendment.

What is that amendment? Ah, you will be called on to vote on it. I am wondering if this coalition that has been formed between the Republicans and the so-called Progressives—who always backslide at the wrong time—is going to endure. I wonder if they are going still to stand with you and vote with you on the proposition. The Senator has an amendment; he has some political milk, some soothing sirup that he is going to give you. I wonder if you are going to take it. Do you know what it does? It does not give a tax reduction to persons of incomes between $15,000 and $60,000 that he said he was going to stand by; but he takes the man whose income is $5,000,000, and says to him, "You are the one who must get the reduction."

Oh, the Senator laughs; and I imagine that when some one on the other side who is easily misled and deceived made the suggestion to him he laughed that cynical laugh then; but we shall show you, when we get to the surtax revision and discuss his amendment and compare it with the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that the amendment we offer gives relief to the man lowest down and gives none to the man with over $70,000 income; while the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah gives no surtax reduction to the man with a net income under $20,000, but everybody above that up to $10,000,000 gets his reduction. Is not that true?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator asks me a question. Does he want it answered?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. Is not that statement correct?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not want any answer.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator wants to hide behind that, all right.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to have an answer.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Virginia has not the floor. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Please do not embarrass the Senator again.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to know whether that statement is true or not. Do you report a bill containing an amendment like that?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator said that we have given the big reduction to the $5,000,000 man. It is not true.

Mr. HARRISON. Do you not give him any reduction in your amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what the Senator said.

Mr. HARRISON. Do you not give him any reduction in your amendment? Of course you do.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. In our amendment we do not.

Mr. SMOOT. Politics, politics! That is all there is over there. Now, will the Senator let me answer the question of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that these are the facts in the case:

Wherever there is a reduction from bracket to bracket in existing law that reduction is carried on at the next bracket, and so on down until it reaches $100,000, we will say. In the existing law it went right through, and they had the credits that each one of the brackets gave. Now, the majority report is that with those brackets they go just as they do in the existing law down to $100,000; and after that, no matter what income the taxpayer may receive, he gets what is accumulated in those brackets, or $470. So the man who has an income of $110,000 gets a reduction of $470 a year and the man who pays $10,000,000, if there is such a taxpayer, gets only $470 reduction; but my friend from Mississippi says that we gave the man with $5,000,000 more than anybody else. It is not true.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not understand me.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me tell you what they are trying to do, Senators: They are trying to fix up a scheme here by which they jump brackets 2 and 3 per cent. What for? In order that when they get down to $80,000, I think, instead of $70,000—I think that is what it is, but I can look it up in a minute and see——

Mr. HARRISON. About $70,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It does not make any difference whether it is $80,000 or $70,000.

Mr. HARRISON. No; figures do not make any difference to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. They want such a figure in there that they will not give the man who receives $110,000 income any reduction whatever. That is what their proposition is. They will not even allow the step brackets where they are transferred from one bracket to another. The credit in the preceding bracket is carried on to the next bracket; and they allow that only just so far as the voters pay—that is all.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator finished? If he has, I thank him for his explanation. It is exactly as I said.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, is it? Well, I will leave it to the Senators. There is just as much truth in that statement as there is in a good many others the Senator has made.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, will the Senator sit down and let me proceed?

Mr. SMOOT. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. I said that the Democratic minority gave no reduction on incomes above approximately $70,000.

Mr. SMOOT. And I do not deny it.

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Senator does not deny it. I said that although the Senator said in that statement last year that he was going to stand for a tax reduction on incomes between $15,000 and $60,000, he had written in an amendment and gotten his colleagues to adopt it, and it is in this bill, giving no reduction in surtaxes on incomes below $20,000, and that all the reduction came on incomes above $20,000. The man with $5,000,000 income got his reduction; the man with $100,000 income got his reduction—any amount above $20,000. That is what I stated.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not all the Senator stated.

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to state some other things in a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not care what the Senator states.

Mr. HARRISON. I know it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator stated that the greatest reduction was given to the man who had $5,000,000 income.

Mr. HARRISON. He gets $470 reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and so does the man get $470 who has to pay a tax on an income of $110,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. So it is not greater. The trouble with the Senator is that what he stated is not the fact.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator had admitted what I stated to be correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; I did not. I say that it is not correct.

Mr. HARRISON. The trouble with the Senator is that he forgets what he states the minute after he states it.

Mr. SMOOT. Did not the Senator say to this body that the man who had $5,000,000 received the greater reduction?

Mr. HARRISON. I said he got a reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator did not say that.

Mr. HARRISON. If it will satisfy the Senator, if I said that he got a greater reduction than the man who had an income of $4,999,999, I will amend it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator did not say greater than the man with an income of $4,999,000. He said he got the greater reduction.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator is trying to filibuster against his own bill.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am not trying to filibuster.

Mr. HARRISON. The trouble with the Senator is that he does not possess a pencil that knows how to stop giving reductions in the higher brackets. He wants it to go away on up, and that is what Mr. Mellon wants. He wants it away up yonder. I had thought that maybe this committee, when they found out the joker that the Senator had put in his proposition, would change front on it, and it may be that they will before it is over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the difference between the two propositions can be explained in a very few words.

The majority proclaimed that they were going to give persons with incomes between $20,000 and $70,000 the benefit of $25,000,000 reduction. That was what was proclaimed. They have prepared a bill, however, which gives persons whose incomes are between $20,000 and $70,000 a reduction of practically $15,000,000—fourteen million and something—and they have given to persons whose incomes exceed $70,000 a reduction of $9,600,000. In other words, of the $25,000,000 reduction that was to have been given to the incomes within these low brackets, instead of doing that they have taken about two-fifths of it and given it to incomes above $70,000.

That is the difference between the two propositions. The Democratic or minority proposition is so adjusted that it gives to those with incomes below $70,000 a reduction of $25,000,000, and does not give to those with incomes above $70,000 one cent of reduction. The majority proposition gives to incomes below $70,000, in round numbers, $15,000,000 reduction, and gives the balance, or $10,000,000 of the $25,000,000, to these higher incomes. That is the effect of the two schemes.

The Senator says that result is produced by manipulation of brackets. It does not make any difference how the result is produced; that is the result of their proposition, and that is the result of our proposition. In other words, our proposition gives all of that reduction to incomes below $70,000, and their proposition in round numbers gives $10,000,000 of the $25,000,000 reduction to incomes above $70,000.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, how many people get this $10,000,000 reduction? How many people get a reduction between those brackets?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. I can tell the Senator. I think it is about 125,000 above and about 225,000 below.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina will relieve 81,000 income taxpayers from all surtaxes. It will give relief, by reducing their income taxes, to 310,000, who have incomes between $10,000 and $70,000. The amendment of the Senator from Utah, which is incorporated in the bill, will give no reduction to the income taxpayer whose income is $20,000 or less, but gives relief only to the 125,000 income taxpayers who are the highest on the list.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going, when this matter is up, to show just exactly who pays the taxes and the number that pay them. I have the diagrams here; and if anybody will give me just one minute's time they can see plainly, if they want to, just the number and who pays this tax. Of course, in this bill all the reduction that the 207 people who pay over a million dollars get out of this whole $25,000,000 is $97,200; that is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Ninety-seven thousand dollars?

Mr. SMOOT. Every taxpayer—and there are 207 of them that pay over a million dollars——

Mr. SIMMONS. Over a million dollars?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, wait; I understood that the Senator wanted to know. In the case of the 207 who pay over that amount, the whole reduction they get, according to the bill as reported by the Senate committee, is $97,200.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I state again, on the authority of the Actuary of the Treasury, that under the majority scheme people whose incomes exceed $70,000—it does not make any difference how high they go, even if they go to $100,000,000—will get this $25,000 reduction, and every one of those whose income is in excess of $100,000 will get a reduction of $470.

Mr. SMOOT. I think if the Senator will take Mr. McCoy's figures——

Mr. SIMMONS. I have the statement here.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator has taken the wrong bracket.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I have the statement in his own handwriting, written in the last few days.

Mr. SMOOT. Here is the statement Mr. McCoy made, and the Senator can figure it out himself and see that he is mistaken in the statement he made.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I want to proceed, and the Senator from Utah can go over his figures and correct them in the meantime.

Mr. SMOOT. Those are not my figures; they are Mr. McCoy's.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I ask the Senator from Utah if under his scheme every man whose income exceeds $100,000 does not get a reduction of $470?

Mr. SMOOT. He does.

Mr. SIMMONS. Under the minority scheme would a man whose income exceeds $100,000 get any reduction at all?

Mr. SMOOT. All get a reduction of $470; it does not make a particle of difference whether the income is over $100,000 or not. Up to whatever it may be each gets $470, brought about by the carrying of each bracket from the first surtax down to the 20 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was not necessary to do that, and we did not do that.

Mr. SMOOT. We thought it was necessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. We do not give any reduction at all in our schedule to those whose incomes exceed $70,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I made that statement the very first day the bill was up for discussion, and explained the difference between the two amendments. There is no question about it.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no question. I am glad the Senator has gotten down to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I stated before, and I do so now, that I wanted the Senate to know the only reason why this whole program has been changed from all former programs of carrying on from bracket to bracket is the desire to make a little political capital out of it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I undertake to say that the Senator was wrong in his former statement as to the amount of the corporation-tax reduction, as to the taxes on admissions to theaters, and as to war nuisance taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; because of the fact——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator always has a reason.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a good reason; because of the fact that the revenue is not sufficient to meet all the demands, and if it had been, certainly I would be here asking for a reduction.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Treasury is correct—as they have never been—then, of course, the Senator may have some sound foundation on which to stand.

Then the Senator has gone back on this proposition of giving a reduction on the surtaxes on incomes between $15,000 and $60,000. Now we understand each other, that the Democratic proposal is that all the reduction shall take place on incomes below $70,000, approximately, and that the majority reductions shall apply to no income below $20,000 but to incomes of $20,000 and upward ad infinitum.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the majority members of the committee wanted——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, let me proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. The majority members of the committee wanted to correct the evil that existed in the imposition of taxes against people with incomes up to $80,000, and it is shown on the map on the wall so plainly that the Senator himself will not deny it. In other words, they are paying a higher tax than they did in 1917, and we undertake to relieve all of those people who were paying a higher income tax under the existing law than they were paying in 1917.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator knows that no one has ever said that the man whose income is $1,000,000 or $5,000,000 was discriminated against.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not talking about that.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is undertaking to give them some reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. Everybody knows what it was given for.

Mr. HARRISON. The only criticism that has been found was as to a little inequality within a certain bracket between twenty-odd thousand dollars, I believe it was, and sixty-odd thousand dollars income.

Mr. SMOOT. Eighty thousand dollars.

Mr. HARRISON. Say $80,000. My recollection is that it was sixty thousand and odd.

Mr. SMOOT. There is the map, which shows that it is $80,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not limit it to them, but goes beyond that, and gives to the man whose income is larger than that just as much reduction as to the fellow who gets an income of $100,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, he is paying exactly the same as he is paying to-day. He has not any reduction whatever. The credit in the past has been from bracket to bracket. He has had that credit, and we have not changed from what the existing law is on the man who has an income of over $100,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says that under his amendment there will be no reduction to the man who gets an income of $500,000.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not say that. I say he gets $470.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, he does; and that is all I said.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what the Senator said. If he has an income of $5,000,000, he gets $470 reduction, and that is all.

Mr. HARRISON. Under our amendment he does not get any.

Mr. President, the Senator says we are playing politics. We are trying to relieve first the man who needs relief.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what we have done.

Mr. HARRISON. And there will be, so far as our votes are concerned, no more tax reduction to the highest fellow, in the highest bracket, until the man of more moderate income has been relieved. We have followed that course throughout, and that is why we have relieved millions already from the payment of surtaxes. That is why we have reduced the people of moderate means by the millions from the payment of income taxes.

The policy we have pursued in the past will be continued in the future. But the Senator and his colleagues never favor a tax reduction bill unless it presents relief for the man with the big income, who does not need tax reduction as much as the poor unfortunate whose income may be $12,000 a year, who, under the Senator's amendment, gets no reduction, while the other fellow does.

That is the way the political minds of the Senator from Utah and his party work, and on the roll call we will see how they vote.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. Do I understand from the Senator that the Senator from Utah has introduced a proposition here to the effect that a man with an income of $100,000 shall get a reduction, but that a man with an income of $12,000 will get no reduction?

Mr. HARRISON. That is exactly the proposition; and the Senator will not rise now and deny that that will be the effect of his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us see what is does. Under the act of 1926 he got a reduction, and not only that——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Virginia is asking about the amendment of the Senator from Utah to this bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I am asking the Senator this: Has he offered an amendment in the Senate under which a man who has an income of $12,000 will get no reduction but a man with $100,000 will get a reduction?

Mr. SMOOT. All that he will ever pay is $20.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not care what he pays. It ought to be proportionate. I want just the proportion, not the amount.

Mr. SMOOT. The man who gets $12,000 net, with all of his allowances, we ask to pay $20 toward maintaining the Government, and I think he is an ungrateful citizen of the United States if he objects to paying $20 toward maintaining the Government of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think that the man who receives an income of $5,000,000, and who gets a reduction of $470, ought to object? He has no objection coming at all, has he?

Mr. SMOOT. Not as to the $470.

Mr. HARRISON. No.

Mr. SMOOT. He is entitled to it, because of the decreases that have been made in all the brackets before.

Mr. SIMMONS. They are not necessary decreases.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that if he will look at the map, he will see there is a little red dot and a whole black line that shows who pays the tax, showing the number of people who pay the great bulk of the taxes to-day, and you can hardly see it when you get up there [indicating].

Mr. HARRISON. I am surprised that the Senator can see the unfortunate moderate class in this country at all. If the Senator would divert his mind from those red, white, and blue colorations up there a while to the poor devils out in the huts throughout this country, who need some relief, it would be better for the country.

Mr. SMOOT. A man must be a "poor devil" who makes $12,000 a year, an awfully "poor devil," when all we ask him to do is to pay $20 toward maintaining the Government of the United States. He receives $2,000 more than a Senator is paid, but he is a "poor devil" when we ask him for $20 toward maintaining the Government of the United States.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I did not ask the Senator for a reason. I want to know whether it is true—I want the specific fact—that a man with an income of $12,000 gets no reduction, but a man with an income of a hundred thousand dollars does get a reduction. I am not asking for the reason that animated the Senator. I simply want to know whether that is true under his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. A $12,000 income——

Mr. SWANSON. I am not asking for a reason, but is that true?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will just wait a minute, I will tell him. A man receiving a $12,000 a year income, under the amendment of the Senator, pays $20 per year.

Mr. SWANSON. What does he pay now?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is only the surtax. He pays a normal tax besides.

Mr. SMOOT. We are talking about the surtaxes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How much of a normal tax is he paying?

Mr. SMOOT. He pays a normal tax.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How much is that?

Mr. SMOOT. Everyone pays a normal tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. He pays as high a normal tax as the man with a million dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. In percentage, but not as much actually.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly; we are talking about percentages.

Mr. SWANSON. And he gets no reduction?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Utah, if he will make some explanation.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator from Utah has not answered the question propounded by the Senator from Virginia. I want to separate his question into two parts. I would like to ask the Senator from Utah whether a man with an income of $12,000 will get any reduction under his proposal.

Mr. SMOOT. No; he does not get any reduction.

Mr. BRATTON. I want to follow that with another question. Would a man with $100,000 income get a reduction; and if so, how much?

Mr. SMOOT. He does not get a reduction in the percentage; the 20 per cent is exactly the same to him.

Mr. HARRISON. In dollars and cents, how much?

Mr. SMOOT. He gets a reduction in the brackets that have already been reduced——

Mr. HARRISON. In dollars and cents, what is the reduction?

Mr. SMOOT. With an income of $100,000, he gets $470.

Mr. BRATTON. Reduction?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BRATTON. That answers the question.

Mr. HARRISON. That answers the question. That is what the Senator has been trying to keep from saying a long time.

Mr. SMOOT. I have said it a dozen times already, or more than a dozen times.

Mr. SIMMONS. How much does the man with an income of $80,000 get?

Mr. SMOOT. A man with an income of $80,000 gets $670.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the man with an income of a million dollars——

Mr. SMOOT. Four hundred and seventy dollars. The man with an income of $80,000—that is shown on the map—gets $670. The man with an income of $100,000 and over gets $470. That is to eliminate the injustice that has been done to him in the past. That is why it was done.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, whether that is an injustice or not is a very serious question. We have considered that heretofore and discussed it heretofore. As a matter of fact, this very man whom the Senator now claims was done an injustice in this reduction got more than justice in the 1917 income surtaxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, with the smaller percentages here, when the time comes, I will say to the Senator, if he will look at the percentages on the wall he will find he is mistaken.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not bothering myself about the percentages on the wall, but I have investigated that; and I know as a matter of fact, and the statistics will confirm the statement, that in the 1917 reductions the men with incomes between $70,000 and $100,000 got the lion's share of the reduction, speaking relatively. Now, the Senator wants them to get the lion's share again, and that is exactly what the minority says is unjust and unfair. If they took it in 1917 they ought not to be asking for it again in 1928.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, let me say——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not want to decline to yield to the Senator from Utah to make a demonstration on his chart on the wall, but I do want to finish what I have to say so we can take up the corporation tax. Then the surtax proposition is coming up following that, and we can discuss it further.

I merely want to call attention to another statement made by the Senator from Utah last June in which he said that he favored a tax reduction of one-half on automobiles, parts, and so forth. He has changed his mind with reference to that the same as he did with reference to the surtaxes and the admission taxes and every other prophesy that he made in June of last year. Of course, I am not unaware of the fact that the first action of the majority members of the Finance Committee in the consideration of this bill was against taking all the taxes off of automobile parts, because they so voted; but under the whip and spur of a pretty aggressive minority of the Finance Committee and under the press of public sentiment throughout the country, the majority did wheel about and then vote to take all the taxes off of automobile parts. I want to congratulate the Senator and his colleagues upon seeing the light on that proposition and finally getting around to take the proper view of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will recall that the majority did not decide to change their position on the automobile taxes until two of their own number had notified them that they would join the minority, which would make a majority in favor of a complete repeal of the automobile taxes. Rather than have the minority get the benefit of that action, they decided to vote with the two members of their own party and claim credit for the reduction.

Mr. HARRISON. That is when the coalition began to work. Then, when they saw how the people were arrayed on this proposition they began to smite the Treasury Department, which had recommended against a reduction of automobile taxes.

The Senator from Utah, and other members of the Finance Committee, will recall how the Undersecretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, came there and protested against taking the taxes off automobiles, but the Senator and his colleagues of the majority of the committee did not think that the Treasury Department were so correct in that suggestion as they think they are correct now in their estimates. Neither did the Senator think the Treasury Department were as correct in their recommendations with reference to the smaller corporations getting some relief, as they thought previously, because they smote that recommendation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will recall, also, that the reason given by the Undersecretary of the Treasury, backed up by the Secretary himself, against repealing the automobile tax was that the automobile is a luxury and competes with the railroads in the transportation of people from one part of the country to another.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and from the questions asked Mr. Mills when he appeared before the committee it would seem that he had a good aide in the chairman of the committee; but when the chairman and his colleagues saw that the truck was going to run over them, they gladly got out of the way.

Mr. President, we propose to keep in the bill the reduction of the corporation tax granted unanimously by the House of Representatives. We believe that the Treasury can stand it easily, and we submit that when the roll is called the House amendment should be adopted, reducing the corporation taxes from 13½ to 11½ per cent.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no disposition to detain the Senate unduly, but inasmuch as I oppose the amendment now pending, I desire to express my opinion with reference to it.

When the majority in the committee were opposing the repeal of the automobile tax as vigorously as they now oppose a reduction in the corporation tax, they were still against a reduction in the corporation tax which they oppose to-day. So that the reason for their opposition to this reduction can not be ascribed to the fact that we have repealed or proposed to repeal entirely the automobile tax, because they opposed both reductions coincidentally and opposed one as vigorously as the other.

I take the position that we can still afford to accept the House provision with reference to corporation taxes, notwithstanding the fact that the loss of revenue involved in the repeal of the automobile tax is something like $66,000,000 per annum.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has to-day alleged that we are seeking to play politics with reference to the tax measure. If the Senator insists upon that charge, I might recite some recent political history which would convince, I think, any fair-minded man that ever since the war ended in 1918 the majority party has played politics with all the tax bills which have been brought into Congress.

I recall that in 1919, after the Republican Party had obtained control of the House and the Senate as a result of the election of 1918, President Wilson very earnestly recommended a reduction in the taxes which had been levied on the people as a result of the war. He recited the fact that the war had ended, that war taxes were excessive and burdensome, and there was no longer any reason why such high tax rates ought to be maintained after the war had ended. While the responsibility for originating tax-reduction bills does not lie in this body, it is a fact that those who were responsible or should have been responsible for the origination of tax legislation in another body, who belonged to the same party then as they do now, refused to permit any adequate legislation to be introduced or seriously considered reducing the war taxes in 1919 because, they said, the war taxes had been levied by a Democratic administration and there was still a Democratic President in office and it would give them a campaign issue in 1920 upon which they could go before the country and charge that the high taxes were levied by the Democratic Party and were kept on by the Democratic Party, notwithstanding the fact that the Republicans were in control of both House and Senate. They refused to reduce the taxes in 1919 to any appreciable degree, and all over the country that issue was made that the Democrats had levied those high taxes and were still collecting them, because there happened to be a Democratic President in the White House.

Mr. SMOOT. We had just had a reduction in taxes in 1919.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was not a reduction that in any way affected the great masses of the people.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can not say it did not affect the masses of the people. It affected everyone having an income from $10,000 up.

Mr. BARKLEY. It did not grant any relief that was in any way commensurate with the President's request.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. In 1921, after the Republicans came into power, the tax reduction bill, which was then proposed, was a tax reduction largely limited to the high surtax rates. Had it not been for the fact that the minority in the House of Representatives and in the Senate insisted on a still greater reduction for the benefit of the average taxpayer, there would have been no relief granted even in that tax bill except to those who paid under the higher brackets of the income tax law.

The same was true of the tax bill of 1924 and again of the tax bill of 1926. It has been largely due to the insistence and the fight made by the members of the minority party on the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee that the average man has received any reduction in taxes such as he was entitled to in any of this legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will read the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, I think he will modify that statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator will refresh his recollection by reading the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee—where the Secretary of the Treasury made the recommendation, first, of a considerable reduction upon the higher income taxes, and then, after he testified before the Ways and Means Committee and observed the temper of that committee toward his own recommendation, came in later with another recommendation which was in harmony with the temper of the Ways and Means Committee as it was exhibited in the hearing when he testified before that committee—I think the Senator will agree with me that in the beginning the Secretary of the Treasury was not in favor of the character of reduction which was finally adopted by the Ways and Means Committee and by Congress.

So if we are to be charged with playing politics with the tax reduction because we are now seeking a greater reduction for the average taxpayer, I reply to the Senator that that has been our course ever since the war. We have insisted on tax reductions for those who belong to the great majority of the people, who do not have enormous incomes, as well as for those with larger incomes.

Mr. President, I say the Treasury can stand the tax reduction which we propose by the reduction in corporation taxes from 13½ to 11½ per cent; because, as has already been emphasized, the Treasury Department, in connection with every tax bill that has been brought to Congress, whether it has deliberately done it or done it because of ignorance of its own affairs, has grossly underestimated not only the revenue that the Government would collect under the tax law but has also to the same extent underestimated the amount of surplus that would be in the Treasury as a result of the tax bills that have passed.

In 1925 the amount of net income from all corporations in the United States subject to taxation was $9,340,000,000, and a 13½ per cent tax on that sum represents $1,170,000,000. By the way, that is one-third of the total amount of revenue collected by the Governmnt, practically speaking. In 1926 the amount of net income from corporations subject to taxation had increased $200,000,000, and in 1927 the figures were about the same. Yet, notwithstanding that fact, the Treasury Department now estimates that the amount of revenue derived from this 13½ per cent tax, if the tax should not be reduced, would be only $1,120,000,000.

In December, 1927, the Treasury Department estimated the surplus for 1929 at $252,000,000. On April 3, 1928, they have revised their figures by estimating that the surplus for 1929 would be $297,000,000. In July, 1927, at the beginning of the fiscal year 1928, the Treasury Department estimated that the surplus for 1928 would be $200,000,000. They began at the very beginning of the fiscal year to estimate the surplus for 1928 and they fixed it at $200,000,000. Yet they were so far wrong in their estimate that on December 31, 1927, six months later, they estimated the surplus for 1928 at $454,000,000, or $254,000,000 more than they had estimated in July, 1927.

In April of this year—last month—according to the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury before the Senate Committee on Finance, it was estimated that the surplus would be $422,000,000 at the end of the present fiscal year, being $222,000,000 more than the estimate of nine months ago.

In 1921 the amount of tax reduction recommended by the Treasury Department was $372,000,000, and even when they recommended a reduction of $372,000,000 the officers of that department feared that there might be a deficit in the Treasury as a result of a greater reduction than that; and yet Congress reduced the taxes that year by $663,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I can tell the Senator the items that caused the increase above the estimate. The actuary who made those estimates is on the floor of the Senate, and I suggest to the Senator that if he will ask him what were the items that made up the difference, I think he can tell the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not time to stop at this point and consult the actuary. I am taking the estimates as given out officially by the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMOOT. For instance, the department did not then know anything about how much money would be collected from railroads; they could not tell as to that. If the Senator will ask Mr. McCoy, the actuary, he can explain the matter in a very little while to the satisfaction of the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think that item becomes material.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean as to the entire difference.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand. What I am speaking about, however, is that the Treasury Department recommended a reduction of $372,000,000; over the protest of the Treasury Department Congress reduced the taxes $663,000,000; and yet, in spite of that reduction of $663,000,000, there was a surplus the next year of $313,000,000. So, if we take account of all the moneys collected from the railroads, it does not make up the discrepancy between actual result and the recommendations and dire predictions of the Treasury Department as to the result if Congress should overstep what the department thought was cautious and wise legislation in the matter of tax reduction. Furthermore, if the Treasury Department's figures had been accepted by Congress and the taxes had been reduced by only $372,000,000, the amount of the surplus in the following year would have been $604,000,000 instead of $313,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. We paid that much more on the national debt.

Mr. BARKLEY. As to the tax bill of 1924 the Treasury Department recommended a reduction of $323,000,000; Congress actually reduced the taxes, over the protest of the Treasury Department, by $519,000,000; and, in spite of that, the surplus the next year was $505,000,000; so that if the Treasury Department's figures had been accepted in 1924 the amount of the surplus would have been $757,000,000.

In 1926 the Treasury Department recommended a tax reduction of $300,000,000; Congress, over the protest of the Treasury Department, reduced taxes by $422,000,000—$122,000,000 more than the Treasury Department thought was wise—yet, in spite of that, the surplus for that year was $307,000,000, and for the following year it was $635,000,000; and if the Treasury Department's figures had been accepted as to tax reduction in 1926 there would have been a surplus of $701,000,000 in the Treasury.

I recall that not very long ago President Coolidge made a speech in which he gave utterance to a sentiment with which I can heartily agree. He said that any government which collects more money from the people in the form of taxes than it needs in order to discharge its just obligations and responsibilities is guilty of legal robbery. If that is true with respect to one form of government, it is true with respect to all forms of government; if it is true with respect to one form of taxation, it is true with respect to all forms of taxation.

There is a surplus in the Treasury of $422,000,000. Congress has by law provided for the payment of our public debt in an orderly way. It has provided for a sinking fund that increases year by year, so that the domestic part of our public debt will be paid in about 20 or 22 years at the present rate of reduction, without resort to the expedient of piling up in the Treasury surpluses under false pretenses and under a prediction of deficits that never occur. The other portion of the public debt is supposed to be provided for from the payments made to us by those who are in debt to the United States Government.

So we have a surplus of $422,000,000, which represents taxes collected by the Government from the people which were unnecessary and beyond the amount required for the ordinary expenses of the Government, but which were collected because the administration refused to permit a tax reduction that would have made it impossible for such a surplus to have been accumulated in the Treasury. By reason of that the administration seeks to make a great record as to debt reduction and the payment of the debt at an earlier date than that provided for by Congress in an orderly manner under the guise of economical administration of the affairs of the Government.

If we have collected during the last four or five years an average of $500,000,000 a year more than the needs of the Government required, we have collected one-third of that $500,000,000 from the corporations of the United States, for they have been paying about one-third of the total taxes. If we have been doing that unjustly, if the Treasury Department has been underestimating the revenues and the surpluses, and by reason of that situation the people and hundreds of thousands of corporations of the country have been overtaxed, then we certainly owe it to them to use the surplus that now exists in the Treasury to spread it out over a term of years and enable them to have a just tax reduction.

If it be true that the reduction of the corporation tax from 13½ per cent to 11½ per cent means a decrease of $82,000,000 a year in revenue, that $82,000,000 a year loss of revenue can be absorbed for five years by the surplus which is already in the Treasury as a result of the overtaxation to which they have been subjected by the administration and by the officials of the Treasury Department.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am very earnestly in favor of the House provision, and I would be willing to go even further and reduce the corporation tax to a greater extent in order that we might do a very tardy piece of justice to a class of our people who have been overtaxed for at least five years, and who, I hope, will not be subject to such injustice in the years to come. Therefore, I shall vote against the committee amendment and in behalf of the House provision for a reduction in the corporation tax to 11½ per cent. This is the only tax which has been increased instead of reduced since the war. While all other taxes have gone down this one has gone up. This tax affects hundreds of thousands of small business concerns in every town and city in the Nation. It ought to be reduced at least as much as the House bill provides for, and I hope the committee amendment will be defeated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have not risen for the purpose of making a set speech. I wish to put a good deal of matter in the RECORD, however, if I can obtain unanimous consent to put it in without reading.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, preliminary to doing that, I wish to say that the Secretary of the Treasury recommended that this tax be fixed at 12 per cent. The House, after very extensive hearings, and, as I understand, probably without any conflict between the two sides of that body, fixed the rate at 11½ per cent. It also repealed the tax on automobiles. So it was the judgment of the body at the other end of the Capitol that the automobile tax could be repealed and the corporation tax could be reduced from 13½ per cent to 11½ per cent without jeopardizing the financial condition of the Treasury. When the bill came to the Senate, however, the majority of the Finance Committee insisted that it was necessary to raise the rate fixed by the House on corporations 1 per cent, and they based that contention upon the ground that they had agreed to repeal the automobile tax.

Mr. President, if there is any tax now levied that is probably more onerous than when it was imposed during the war time it is this corporation income tax. It is the one tax that in recent years has been increased. We increased it in the act of 1926 from 12½ per cent to 13½ per cent. At first we increased it from 12½ per cent to 13 per cent because of the repeal of the capital-stock tax. That was logical, and so the bill was authorized to be reported to the Senate. But before the bill, as I remember, was actually reported to the Senate, there was what was called an emergency meeting of the Finance Committee. The committee had already arranged to recoup the loss caused by repeal of the capital-stock tax, but we were called in a meeting in a room in the Capitol below the Senate Chamber, and it was explained to us that the Secretary of the Treasury insisted that upon the basis of 12½ per cent there would be a deficit for the year 1927 of $51,000,000.

It was further explained to the committee that in order to prevent that catastrophe to the Treasury it was necessary to raise the rates of the corporation tax from 13 per cent to 13½ per cent, and that was done over the protest of the minority. The Senator from Utah shakes his head, but it was done in his room at an emergency meeting of the committee which raised the rate from 13 to 13½ per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. It was raised from 12½ to 13½ per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I recall, we first fixed it at 13 per cent and then it was increased to 13½ per cent. However, take either horn of the dilemma, it was done for the purpose, as was alleged, of preventing a deficit for the year 1927 of $51,000,000.

The year 1927 rolled around, Mr. President, and instead of a deficit of $51,000,000—the pretext for raising this tax, according to the Senator, one whole per cent, or $81,000,000—when the receipts came in there was a surplus in the Treasury of $627,000,000. It was during that year, by reason of that surplus, that I, representing the minority, inaugurated a movement for a tax reduction. The President responded and proposed, instead of a tax reduction, that we should have a tax refund, admitting that there was money in the Treasury that was not needed for governmental purposes.

The tax-refund idea was rejected, and properly rejected, by the country, although proposed by the President in an open statement made in reply to a statement that I made. It was first repudiated by the country; and then, when the Committee on Ways and Means met, upon a motion to adopt the President's scheme, that committee refused to do it and rejected the White House plan.

What has become of all of that money, Mr. President—$627,000,000? The Senator says it was applied to the debt. Before we get through with this bill, Mr. President, I am going to show that by the use of these surpluses extorted from the people in excess of the necessary requirements of the Government the majority are proceeding with the deliberate purpose and design of forcing the people to pay off this indebtedness from five to six years earlier than the requirements of the law which the Congress has enacted for the purpose of retiring that debt; but, Mr. President, I shall not go into that discussion now.

The Senator from Utah, representing the majority, says that the tax of 11½ per cent would be perfectly justifiable, and he himself would favor it, if it were not for the fact that the condition of the Treasury does not justify it.

Mr. President, in every tax reduction that we have made in this Chamber—in 1924, in 1926, and before—we were told that if we reduced taxation as much as the minority proposed, or anything like as much as the minority proposed, there would be a deficit in the Treasury; and in each case, instead of a deficit, there was a tremendous surplus which was applied to the public debt.

Mr. President, I am going to put in the RECORD—I had intended to ask that the clerk read it, but I will not have that done—a statement with respect to these estimates. This statement is rather full. It starts at an early period in this process of reduction, and traces each bill from the beginning up to the present time, and shows that in every single instance the reduction made was actually in excess and largely in excess of what the Treasury said it could stand, and that in each instance the result shows that the Treasury did stand the reduction that was made, and could have stood many millions of dollars of additional reduction.

I shall content myself simply by asking that this statement be incorporated in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

ESTIMATES OF REVENUE

One of the critical problems in the consideration of tax reduction is that of estimating the future expected revenue and the future expected expenditures. The difference between these two estimates gives us the estimated surplus. In a statement presented to the Ways and Means Committee by the Secretary of the Treasury on October 31, 1927, the surplus for 1928 was estimated at $455,000,000, and that for 1929 at $274,000,000. On April 3, 1928, before the Finance Committee, the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury reduced the estimated surplus for 1928 to $401,000,000 and for 1929 to $212,000,000. This reduction is accounted for in the statement by an increase in the expenditures. It is worthy of note that the Treasury Department admits an increase in revenue of $50,000,000 in back-tax collection for 1929 over the October estimate. The matter of back taxes will be referred to later.

The first question which must be squarely met is the question of how much reliance can be placed on these Treasury estimates. It is well known that such estimates for a period of years have been notoriously low. This is admitted even by the Treasury Department itself. The October statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, already referred to, contains the following admission:

"For a number of years past the Treasury estimates have underestimated the revenue which was later realized."

In spite of the above admission, it is well to briefly summarize some of these former Treasury estimates in order to show the extent of such errors in judgment. This summary follows, arranged by estimates for fiscal years beginning with 1922:

ESTIMATES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1922

1. A deficit of $24,469,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in December, 1921, in his annual report to Congress. This estimate was too low by $338,270,000.

2. A surplus of $47,000,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in April, 1922, in a letter to the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. This estimate was too low by $266,801,000.

3. The actual surplus for 1922 was $313,801,651.

It is obvious from the above that even an estimate made only two and one-half months before the close of the fiscal year 1922 was grossly in error. This estimate was made after the March 15 returns were available, and in a situation similar to the present.

ESTIMATES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1923

1. A deficit of $484,900,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in April, 1922, in a letter to the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. This estimate was too low by $794,557,000.

2. A deficit of $273,939,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in December, 1922, in his annual report to Congress. This estimate was too low by $583,596,000.

3. A surplus of $125,000,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in May, 1923, in a letter announcing the Treasury's financing program for May. This estimate was still too low by $184,657,000.

4. The actual surplus for 1923 was $309,657,000.

This year is a good example of consistently low Treasury estimates, slowly rising in the face of indisputable facts. The estimate made one year and two months before the close of the fiscal year is over three-quarters of a billion dollars low, that made about a month and a half before the close of the fiscal year is still $184,000,000 low.

ESTIMATES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1924

1. A surplus of $180,969,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in December, 1922, in his annual report to Congress. This estimate proved too low by $324,398,000.

2. A surplus of $329,639,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in December, 1923, in his annual report to Congress. This estimate proved too low by $175,728,000.

3. A surplus of $325,000,000 was used by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in his debate on the revenue act on April 24, 1924. This estimate was too low by $180,367,000.

4. The actual surplus for 1924 was $505,367,000.

The Treasury estimates at this time were very truly characterized by the late Senator Jones, of New Mexico, on the floor of this Chamber on April 24, 1924, when he stated as follows:

"* * * I will say a word, however, regarding the question of surplus which was estimated by the Treasury Department. I have lost all faith in the Treasury estimates. When I look back over the history of the adjusted compensation bill—the bonus bill—I find that whenever there was even a thought that legislation of that kind might be enacted there came from the Treasury Department the most pessimistic howl that ever came from a responsible source. Some estimates were made varying more than $1,100,000,000, varying from a surplus of over $300,000,000 to a deficit of over $822,000,000. Every time the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Director of the Budget sought to make a speech there was a new estimate made, a new result, and it is incontestably true that every time such a speech was to be made for a specific purpose estimates from the Treasury Department conformed to the purpose which the advocate was attempting to substantiate. I have heard it said by an official of the Government in authority that the figures had been juggled. The mere figures themselves, the occasions when they were used, the purpose kept in mind, shows that they were made to fit the case."

ESTIMATES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1925

1. A surplus of $67,884,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in December, 1924, in his annual report to Congress. This estimate proved too low by $182,621,000.

2. A surplus of $200,000,000 was predicted by President Coolidge as late as June 22, 1925, in a public address. This estimate, only eight days prior to the close of the year, was still $50,505,000 too low.

3. The actual surplus for 1925 was $250,505,000.

There was no new revenue act passed in 1925, and the estimates are somewhat closer than in former years, but they were still low.

ESTIMATES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1926

1. A surplus of $290,000,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in October, 1925, in his statement to the Ways and Means Committee. This estimate was too low by $87,767,000.

2. A surplus of $262,041,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in December, 1925, in his annual report to Congress. This estimate was too low by $115,726,000.

3. The actual surplus for 1926 was $377,767,000.

It should be noted that heavy tax reductions were made in the revenue act of 1926, passed on February 26, 1926, which should have materially lowered the estimated amounts under the then existing law if the estimates had been correct. In spite of this tax reduction, however, the surplus was much greater than estimated prior to such reduction.

ESTIMATES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1927

1. A surplus of from $250,000,000 to $300,000,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in his statement in October, 1925, before the Ways and Means Committee. This estimate was too low by at least $335,809,000.

2. A surplus of $330,307,000 was predicted by Secretary Mellon in December, 1925, in his annual report to Congress. This estimate was too low by $305,502,000.

3. A surplus of $185,000,000 was predicted by President Coolidge in an address on June 21, 1926. This estimate was too low by $450,809,000.

4. A surplus of $383,079,000 was predicted by President Coolidge in his Budget message to Congress on December 9, 1926. This estimate proved too low by $252,730,000.

5. The actual surplus on June 30, 1927, was $635,809,000.

ESTIMATES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1928

1. A surplus of $20,000,000 was estimated by President Coolidge in an address on June 21, 1926.

2. A surplus of $338,000,000 was estimated by President Coolidge in an address on June 10, 1927.

3. A surplus of $454,283,000 was estimated by Secretary Mellon in December, 1927, in his annual report to Congress.

4. A surplus of $401,000,000 was predicted on April 3, 1928, by Secretary Mellon in a statement to the Senate Finance Committee.

This year is not yet concluded. Even at this late date it is doubtful if the estimates are very accurate in the light of the past.

ESTIMATES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1929

As already stated, the latest estimate for the year 1929 is a surplus of $212,000,000 under existing law. This is too low, and the importance of a correct estimate for 1929 is paramount in the consideration of the pending bill.

CONCLUSION

The minority has in the past consistently contended that the estimates of the Treasury were too low. The majority has just as consistently defended these estimates. The actual results have shown the correctness of the minority's views. This can be conclusively established from the record.

The Treasury has in particular almost certainly overestimated refunds and underestimated back taxes for the year 1929.

They have failed to take account of the fact that this is the first year for four or five years when the payment of refunds has not been delayed on account of lack of funds in the refund appropriation. Usually this has resulted in a postponement of refunds due in one fiscal year into the next year. We are now caught up with refund payments and the appropriation is not exhausted. Refunds should be less in 1929 as the peak appears past.

It also appears probable that the back-tax collections for 1929 are underestimated. There are deficiencies in excess of $600,000,000 still pending before the United States Board of Tax Appeals and information is to the effect that the special advisory committee recently established by the Treasury Department are settling a large number of tax cases with a very considerable recovery on additional assessment.

These two items alone may increase the estimated surplus by $60,000,000 to $100,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is estimated, I think, that making allowances for these underestimates as to the amount of reduction that the Treasury could stand, made each time, without exception, in every case of reduction—taking that into account, and comparing it with the actual results—it is estimated by an expert whom I had to help me in the preparation of this document, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, that there is a margin of at least $100,000,000 that might be added to the estimated amount now constituting the surplus in the Treasury. From the same paper it will appear that after a careful study of the amounts likely to be paid by the Government in refunds of taxes and received from deficiencies—that is, from the collection of back taxes—the estimates of the Treasury Department have been too high, and are too high this year, as to the refunds, and are entirely too low as to the amount that may be expected from back taxes. After a careful consideration of the facts disclosed by 6,000 cases of back taxes that are now pending, unsettled—after estimating carefully the amount of refunds that probably would be required and the amount that would be collected on account of deficiencies in tax payments—it was estimated that the Treasury's estimate is from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000 less than it should be; so that these two items put together would justify an additional reduction over that estimated by the Treasury of $200,000,000.

Mr. President, in addition to that, I propose to offer an amendment, which I have had printed, providing the exact amount that shall from year to year be appropriated by Congress for the sinking fund. In that amendment, carrying out the legislation known as the Liberty loan and Victory loan acts, I have provided that the money received by the Government from our foreign debtors shall be covered into the sinking fund and constitute a part of it. The estimated amount of revenue from this source is about $260,000,000 per year. If that is done—and it ought to be done, Mr. President, because both the Liberty loan acts and the Victory loan act provide for its appropriation in payment of the public debt—it will release $160,000,000 of money that is now raised by taxation upon the people every year and which goes into the sinking fund. That will reduce the amount that we will have to realize through taxation by the amount of $160,000,000. I do not wish to go into a discussion of that amendment now, but simply to state what it would accomplish.

I do not know what the Senate is going to do about this amendment. I know what it is going to do about these amendments to the revenue act. The majority have a working arrangement over there, Mr. President, that enables us to tell exactly how many votes they are going to get. Under that operating arrangement many Senators on the other side will vote against their record, will cast votes that are diametrically in conflict with those which they cast in 1926, will cast votes which do not conform to their own judgment and their convictions; but it is a part of an arrangement, and we recognize it. I am not criticizing it, but I am ready to meet it and face the situation squarely.

Our amendments have been doomed from the very beginning by reason of this hard-and-fast understanding that eliminated the judgment and the convictions of certain Senators on the other side of the Chamber; but I do not suppose that applies to this sinking-fund amendment. I do not think it was within the terms of the contract, if I may so characterize it; and I sincerely hope that when we get to that we shall have an honest expression of the judgment of the individual Senators representing both sides of this Chamber. If we do, this large fund coming to us from across the water will reduce to the extent of about one-half the $330,000,000 that we now annually have to appropriate and raise by taxation for the sinking fund; and, as I said before, will release that much more for reduction of taxes, and we will pay off the war debt of this country—the entire war debt, whether it be domestic or foreign—without any additional amount coming into the sinking fund under the automatic arrangement in the statute except that which is realized from interest upon the bonds which are purchased and put in the sinking fund.

We will pay it off in 1950, 22 years from now, and if we pay it off in that length of time we will have accomplished one of the most wonderful financial feats in the history of mankind. We will in about one generation have paid off a debt the principal of which was $20,000,000,000, and the interest upon which at that time will have amounted to $20,000,000,000, or a total of $40,000,000,000 within the life of one generation.

If we go on piling up these great surpluses and appropriating those surpluses to the payment of this war tax, as heretofore, unnecessarily collecting this enormous amount from the taxpayers to apply to it, the Government will probably be able to pay off its debt in 15 or 16 years' time. I do believe that it is not wise public policy to press down too hard this burden upon the present generation. The present generation is not only oppressed with high Federal taxes, but the present generation has been compelled, by conditions it could not control, through States and the various subdivisions of States, to levy upon the people enormous burdens of taxation. To fail to do it would have made it impossible for this great country of ours to take advantage of the inventions and the conveniences which modern conditions have brought about.

In some sections of the United States, especially in the agricultural sections, local taxes are so burdensome that they amount almost to confiscation of land. It makes it impossible in many instances, even with the practice of the utmost frugality, to make both ends meet. When you add the taxes to the other costs which have made the situation of the farmer so distressing, you have a condition that is appalling.

Mr. President, when the States, in order to take advantage of modern conditions, have been forced to assume this enormous indebtedness which results in these heavy taxes; when the United States is confronted by no emergency at all, the emergency which justified the imposition of these high rates having long since passed; when the United States does not need the money it is now raising annually by taxation, why should it insist, in these conditions, upon continuing these emergency war taxes which we levy? Why should it insist that this generation shall pay off this debt in a period of time less than one-third asked by our foreign debtors? Why should it insist on paying it off in a shorter time than probably any country in the world has ever taken to pay off a proportionate obligation?

I am saying this in advance of introducing this amendment because I really want to challenge the attention of the Senate to this proposition. I think it is of the utmost importance, and it is particularly pertinent at this time, because without imposing any new burdens upon the people, it will make available $160,000,000 a year additional for purposes of tax reduction.

Summing up, if this amendment is adopted, and if I have made a correct estimate—and I have had the assistance of a very able expert in making that estimate—there is at least $160,000,000 more which may be added to the estimated surplus of the department. So that the two things put together will provide for $300,000,000 that is now available for tax reduction in excess of the amount conceded by the Treasury.

Mr. President, I want to offer now for publication in the RECORD, without reading, certain excerpts from the hearings before the Committee on Finance on the pending bill, the marked portions on page 246, on page 248, on page 288, and on page 289. These several excerpts, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, are found in the testimony of representatives of the United States Chamber of Commerce who appeared before the Finance Committee to challenge the statement of the Treasury that its condition would not permit of reduction of the income tax on corporations below 12 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From a letter of Mr. Lewis E. Pierson, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, to Hon. REED SMOOT, chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate]

* * * * * * *

It would seem reasonable to assume that—granted that business conditions in 1928 calendar year remain in general at a parity with the business conditions of 1927—receipts in 1929 fiscal year from current corporation tax at a rate of 13½ per cent would exceed the official estimate of $1,120,000,000 by at least $100,000,000.

* * * * * * *

EFFECT OF CHAMBER'S PROGRAM ON 1929 (FISCAL YEAR)

As has been shown, the national chamber's committee believes that the official estimates of receipts for the fiscal year 1929 are still too low by more than $100,000,000. Moreover, the chamber's committee has pointed out that there will be available approximately $400,000,000 for current expenses should an actual need arise. Approximately $160,000,000 of this is in interest received from foreign governments which can be used for current expenses of the Government instead of being used as heretofore for debt retirement. Added to this would be a sum up to $250,000,000 from the surplus of June 30, 1928, carried into the new year.

[From the testimony of Mr. John M. Redpath, manager research department, United States Chamber of Commerce]

The CHAIRMAN. Then how do you make up the $400,000,000? I can not understand that. If you will submit the figures, showing how you make up that $400,000,000 without the two items referred to by Mr. Mills, I will see that they get in the record. I can not figure out how you can do it, but maybe you can.

Mr. REDPATH. Would you like them for the record?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. I would like to have you hand them to me.

Senator SIMMONS. Let us have them in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be in the record.

The statement for the record is as follows:

"In a public statement issued under date of January 3, 1928, copies of which were sent to members of the Senate Finance Committee, it is observed that to the $252,000,000 of surplus then officially estimated for June 30, 1929, there should be added an amount on account of the conservatism of that estimate. It was suggested that the corporation income tax would yield about $135,000,000 more than the Treasury estimated and that back taxes would yield about $50,000,000 more than the Treasury estimated. These two items added to the surplus of $252,000,000, the official estimate, made a total of $437,000,000.

"The Treasury has not yet made any specific allowance for increased yield in the corporation income tax, but it has added $5,000,000 from current income tax of both kinds and $40,000,000 to its estimate of yield from back taxes, offsetting these amounts by $85,000,000 on the expenditure side, although that total sum has not yet been voted by Congress. By this calculation it now reduces the surplus earlier estimated at $252,000,000 to $212,000,000 for June 30, 1929.

"In support of the proposition that the official estimate of the 1929 surplus is too low, we desire to refer also to the assertion that, since the March collections from income tax are now known, the collections for the remainder of the calendar year—including the first two quarters of 1929 fiscal year—are known. Collections for the March quarter in recent years have varied from 32.2 per cent of the total for the four quarters of the calendar year to 26.5 per cent. Last year the percentage was 27.6 per cent. Any calculation based upon the collections in the March quarter of 1928, therefore, may prove to be wide of the mark by an amount running into the hundreds of millions.

"Apparently some confusion has arisen from the circumstance that the chamber has said, and believes, that the Treasury estimate for June 30, 1929, of a surplus of $212,000,000 is still too low and repeats that statement in to-day's presentation. It has to-day made the further explanation that, wholly disregarding any possible increase in yield over the Treasury estimate of surplus, the whole chamber program of tax reductions and repeals could be allowed.

"This is clear by reason of the discretionary power resting with the Secretary of the Treasury to carry over, say, $251,000,000 from the surplus of the current fiscal year (now estimated at $401,000,000). This $251,000,000 added to the $212,000,000 estimate of 1924 gives a total of $463,000,000, while in that year, without allowing for any increase for growing taxable income of the country, the chamber's program would not reduce public revenues by more than $394,000,000. The further point is made that if need be the power rests with the Treasury to devote up to $160,000,000 of foreign interest payments as an offset against the interest which our Government is paying to the American holders of Government securities, thereby reducing the charge on current taxes by that amount.

"It is obvious that there has been no shift in the argument, but simply two separate presentations."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when Mr. Mills made his statement proposing 12½ per cent, one-half per cent higher than Mr. Mellon had originally himself demanded, I asked that the United States Chamber of Commerce representatives be invited to come before the committee, because Mr. Mills in his presentation, in my judgment, went entirely too far. Very frequently he left the manuscript that had been prepared as the views of the Secretary of the Treasury and addressed the committee in heated terms in criticism of the United States Chamber of Commerce. I knew that their attitude with respect to this question had offended the President. They insist that the Treasury Department can stand a reduction to 10 per cent. When that was announced, the President, it is said, was very much displeased. Mr. Mills showed that his displeasure was hot and that the displeasure of the Treasury Department was hot. So we asked these gentlemen to come before the committee, and they came, representing the greatest body of commerce, I suppose, in the world; representing the business men of this country, little and big. They had deliberately had this matter investigated, not by laymen but by the highest talent these great organizations are able to control. Even the little chambers of commerce in the small towns try to get men who have some expert knowledge in matters of finance, but the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, we must assume, summon to their help and to their assistance, when great questions of this kind are to be determined, the very highest talent, the most capable experts they can find to make their investigations.

The conclusion with reference to the condition of the Treasury, and as to the reduction it could afford to allow in behalf of corporations, was made after the most thorough investigation by their experts, these gentlemen told us. They brought some of their experts before the committee. Those experts measured up in their statements to the highest standards of their profession. They brought some of the luminaries of the great manufacturing and commercial world before the committee, and though their statements were challenged, they were undaunted, they defended their position, they declared that they were right and that the Government was wrong, and they pointed their finger to the fact, as I have to-day, and as the Senator from Mississippi has to-day, that the Treasury Department has never made an estimate in connection with any of these tax bills pending since the war, when it did not estimate well below the actual surplus that the disclosures exhibited when the books were closed at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. President, I am ready for a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. BRATTON. In what form is the question we are voting upon being submitted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 15, line 19.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I say that my understanding is that this vote will be upon the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee to the bill; that is, to raise the rate fixed by the House from 11½ per cent to 12½ per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. In his absence I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], I vote "yea."

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. If that Senator were present he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COPELAND. My colleague the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is necessarily detained from the Chamber. If he were present and permitted to vote he would vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN. I find that I can transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], which I do, and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. JONES. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]; and

Mr. HARRISON subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD immediately following the vote that was taken on the corporation tax provision of the revenue bill portions of a speech delivered by Mr. Lewis E. Pierson, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, as well as two resolutions which were adopted by the United States Chamber of Commerce at their recent meeting in Washington on the question of the corporation tax.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

OPENING ADDRESS OF LEWIS E. PIERSON, PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES BEFORE NATIONAL COUNCILLORS, MAY 7, 1928—MONDAY, 10 A. M.

The voting power of any organization in our membership, no matter how great its own membership or financial budget, is restricted to 10 votes on any single referendum proposition. This is to prevent any one interest or any one section dominating the chamber. By reason of their greater numbers in the organization, small business and the smaller communities throughout the country have a predominating voice in determining our policies. Thus, the idea that we sometimes hear that our national chamber is dominated by "big business," or by this or that interest, falls of its own absurdity.

Let me repeat that the national chamber's policies are dictated solely by its organization membership. That is a distinguishing characteristic of the chamber. The officers and directors and the staff have no power to fix policies. Their function is to use their best efforts toward putting into effect policies the membership has decreed.

So it is of prime importance that all the chambers of commerce and trade associations making up our membership not only carefully and studiously participate in referenda so that the policies of the chamber, when determined, may represent the opinion of a truly representative cross section of American business, but that they also give the officers and staff of the national chamber their intelligent and unstinted support in seeing those policies through.

To further the proper consideration and careful study of all referenda and to assure the continuance of the support of the national chamber's objectives by the member organizations is the rôle of the national councillor. Thus the effectiveness of our organization depends in no small degree upon the effectiveness of the councillor.

The past year has been one of many activities on the part of your officers, directors, committeemen, and staff in presenting to our national legislative authorities the views of our membership on Federal tax reduction, Mississippi River flood control, private ownership and operation of our merchant marine, the restoration of alien property, postal-rate revision, railroad consolidation, and many other issues.

Let us consider Federal tax reduction as an example of these activities. By the largest vote ever cast in a chamber referendum, and by an almost overwhelming majority, the chamber was committed to its tax position by its membership.

Acting in the usual way—openly and publicly—your officials, in their proper capacity as your instructed representative, accepted this taxation mandate and have been unremitting in their efforts to see it through.

It is a race to-day between the taxpayer and the tax spender. The national chamber champions the taxpayer. Fairness and equity and every reasonable consideration for necessary Government revenue are in harmony with the chamber's position for tax reduction. That position is sound. It was sound when your committee made its recommendations. It was sound when the membership, by an almost unanimous vote, indorsed it. Nothing has since occurred to modify it. It is sound to-day.

The chamber is committed to the position that Government income and Government expenditures should substantially balance. Large surpluses are an inducement for demands on Congress for extravagant spending.

With the country's total annual tax bill for all purposes—Federal, State, and local—upward of eleven billions, extravagant spending of funds raised by taxation involves a burden upon the productive enterprise of our people that must be seriously reckoned with as a factor detrimental to national prosperity.

Be it understood, however, that since the adoption of the Federal Budget system Congress has kept its appropriations well within the recommendations of the Budget estimates. In fact, in six years the actual appropriations made by Congress for Budget items have been $359,193,422.97 less than the total Budget recommendations. None the less, Congress is under tremendous outside pressure to override the Budget, and Treasury surpluses are a constant incentive to such demands.

Another danger lies in the pressure for expenditures with which the Budget recommendations can not deal because these recommendations are limited to items authorized by law. In other words, new legislation, demanding heavy expenditures, is encouraged by large surpluses. These are beyond the check of the Budget.

Three previous tax revisions have granted substantial reductions to all sources of Federal revenue except the corporation-income tax. Those rates were increased and are now higher than the war level. The chamber's position, established by referendum, advocates the reduction of this tax to a rate of 10 per cent.

Who are the owners of our corporations whom such a tax reduction would benefit?

Many millions of stockholders; funds of insurance companies belonging to millions of policyholders; endowment funds of educational and charitable institutions; and millions of small investors, including workers throughout the Nation whose savings are invested in corporate stocks.

Such a reduction in the corporate levy would free funds for productive enterprise and would further stabilize business conditions and employment and aid our people to meet foreign competition now entering our markets.

It is important, also, for the future of business that the Government cease to rely on excessive and war-time taxes for its revenue, and that the country be placed upon an equitable peace-time basis of taxation.

The country can afford tax reduction. It can not longer afford to be denied it.

In this, as in all its other activities involving national legislative policies, your chamber has voiced the opinion of a representative section of American business. It is the one organization in America that can so speak—speak with the authority of a definite instruction—an organization that is not autocratic but truly democratic.

Recognizing the importance of taxation in all its phases and its intimate bearing on the prosperity of the Nation, your board of directors, after careful consideration, has set up a committee for study of State and local taxation to the end of developing a coordinated and militant public sentiment for sound and equitable taxation methods and orderly budgetary procedure in State and local fiscal affairs.

This is consistent with the national chamber's vigorous and successful support of Federal budgeting. Its first referendum, in 1912, put the chamber on record in favor of a Federal budget system. And since the enactment of the act creating the Budget Bureau the chamber has been unfaltering in its support.

The process of obtaining the opinion of our constituent membership by referendum is invariably the same.

First. Is a fact-finding survey, by a committee of men, eminent in business, and qualified for the task assigned.

Second. Is a statement of conclusions and recommendations drawn from that fact finding.

* * * * * * *

It is gratifying to know, however, as we do know from our contacts with our member organizations, that in by far the majority of cases their consideration of referenda is careful and intelligent, and their votes reflect a sound and mature judgment.

The national chamber has upheld the right and the duty of representative business organization to voice its opinion and present its views in the formulation of national policies in which the welfare of the entire country is involved. It has not spoken the language of special interest, or of group or of sectional interest. It has advocated the interests of the entire national community as those interests have been carefully and deliberately determined in a representative manner.

FEDERAL TAXATION

The membership of the National Chamber has, through referendum vote, repeatedly gone on record for a proper equalization of the Federal tax schedules. Despite continued large surpluses certain taxes levied for war purposes are still an unnecessary burden on the American public. We believe that the condition of the finances of the country to be expected will warrant the reduction of the corporation income tax to not more than 10 per cent, the elimination of the war excise taxes on particular businesses, and the repeal of the estate tax. These declarations have been convincingly supported in the report which was before the membership in referendum 50.

IMPROVEMENT OF FEDERAL TAX LAWS AND THEIR ADMINISTRATION

An earlier declaration is affirmed to the effect that a proper fiscal policy requires that Federal revenues and expenditures should substantially balance. If the amounts now provided by statute are not retiring the national debt with sufficient rapidity then Congress should designate additional definite funds for that purpose which can be properly budgeted, and adventitious and uncertain amounts, such as year-end surpluses, should not be relied upon for the reduction of funded obligations. When large year-end surpluses result they should be returned to taxpayers in proportion to the taxes they have paid.

The work of the joint congressional tax committee during the past year is noted with satisfaction, and a previous declaration that Congress provide adequate facilities for the committee to complete its proposed objectives is affirmed. The administration of the income tax continues to impose unwarranted hardships on taxpayers. While fully cognizant of the difficulties involved in administration during the war and the period immediately following, after a decade for organization, recruiting of personnel and accumulating experience and precedents, the public has a right to expect and demand a plane of efficiency which has not yet been reached.

Removal of delay and congestion in one part of the collecting system has resulted only in transferring such delay and congestion to some other point without materially accelerating the final closing of cases. Expedients heretofore adopted have not accomplished the desired relief. A thorough survey of the administration of the Federal income tax should be made by the best talent that can be procured for the purpose of determining the causes of delay and congestion and methods whereby improvements can be made.

The administrative provisions relative to internal-revenue taxation should be segregated and codified, and retroactive provisions operating to the disadvantage of the taxpayers should be avoided and those existing eliminated. Provisions, either statutory or administrative rulings, which are harsh in their nature and not in conformity with accepted standards of equity and fairness should be avoided, and those in operation repealed. Income-tax returns made in good faith and in accordance with regulations existing at the time such returns were made should not later be disturbed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 11577. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 12875. An act making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

BRIDGES IN ALABAMA

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13481) granting the consent of Congress to the Alabama State Bridge Corporation to construct, maintain, and operate bridges across the Tennessee, Tombigbee, Warrior, Alabama, and Coosa Rivers, within the State of Alabama. The bill has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CURTIS. The bill is in the regular form?

Mr. BLACK. It is, and it was reported unanimously by the committee.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Alabama State Bridge Corporation, a body corporate organized and existing under an act of the Legislature of Alabama approved August 31, 1927, to construct, maintain, and operate toll bridges at or near the following points within the State of Alabama, to wit:

One across the Tennessee River at or near Whitesburg Ferry on the Huntsville-Cullman Road, between Madison and Morgan Counties; one across the Tennessee River at or near Guntersville on Huntsville-Guntersville Road, in Marshall County; one across the Tennessee River at or near Scottsboro on the Scottsboro-Fort Payne Road, in Jackson County; one across the Tombigbee River near Butler on the Butler-Linden Road, between Choctaw and Marengo Counties; one across the Tombigbee River at or near Epes on the Eutaw-Livingston Road, between Sumter and Greene Counties; one across the Tombigbee River at or near Gainesville, on the Gainesville-Eutaw Road, between Sumter and Greene Counties; one across the Tombigbee River at or near Cochrane on the Aliceville-Cochrane Road, in Pickens County; one across the Warrior River, between Eutaw and Linden, at or near Demopolis, Ala., between Greene and Marengo Counties or between Greene and Hale Counties; one across the Warrior River at or near Eutaw on the Eutaw-Greensboro Road, between Greene and Hale Counties; one across the Alabama River at or near Claiborne on the Monroeville-Grove Hill Road, between Monroe and Clarke Counties; one across the Alabama River near Camden on the Camden-Linden Road, in Wilcox County; one across the Coosa River at or near Childersburg on the Columbiana-Talladega Road, between Shelby and Talladega Counties; one across the Coosa River at or near Riverside on the Anniston-Birmingham Road, between St. Clair and Talladega Counties; one across the Coosa River at or near Cedar Bluff on the center to Georgia State-Line Road, in Cherokee County; one across the Tombigbee River at or near Jackson, between Clarke and Washington Counties; all of said bridges shall be located at points suitable to the interests of navigation and shall be constructed in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridges the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridges under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the costs of the bridges, including reasonable interest on bonds issued to provide funds for constructing the same, as soon as possible, under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 18 years from the date of approval of this act. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, and in any event after such period of 18 years, all of said bridges shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls. All tolls collected for the use of said bridges shall be kept in a separate fund by the proper authorities of the State of Alabama, according to the law of said State, and no part of said funds shall be used for any purpose except for paying for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridges and amortizing the costs of constructing the same, including interest, as provided in this act. The tolls charged by the Alabama State Bridge Corporation, its successors or assigns, shall be uniform as between persons, and as between vehicles of the same type, using each of such bridges, and the corporation shall not authorize or permit any discrimination between persons or between vehicles of the same type transiting any particular bridge constructed under the provisions of this act: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to prevent different tolls being charged at different bridges, but in fixing the rate of tolls there shall be no discrimination as between persons and none as between vehicles of the same type. An accurate record of the cost of the bridges, the amount of notes or bonds issued for the construction of the same, and the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, the daily tolls collected, and the sinking fund on hand shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF NORTHWESTERN BANDS OF SHOSHONE INDIANS

Mr. FRAZIER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 710) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, adjudicate, and render judgment in claims which the Northwestern Bands of Shoshone Indians may have against the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, and 4, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the words "for the benefit of any" and before the words "of said Indians" insert the words "band or bands," so as to make the amendment read:

"Any payment which may have been made by the United States, including gratuities for the benefit of any band or bands of said Indians or for their support and civilization, shall not operate as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as a set-off in said suit.

And the House agree to the same.

THOS. D. SCHALL,
HENRY F. ASHURST,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SCOTT LEAVITT,
W. H. SPROUL,
JOHN M. EVANS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the chairman of the committee if he will consent to lay aside the conference report for a few days. I am prompted to submit the request because a gentleman, who represents the Indians who will be the beneficiaries, wants to get the view of the Indians before final action is taken, and that can be obtained within a few days.

Mr. FRAZIER. That course is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will lie on the table.

SAN CARLOS INDIAN RESERVATION BRIDGES, ARIZONA

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 4321) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of two bridges on the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in Arizona, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 1128) thereon. It is a short bill in the nature of an emergency measure. I ask that the bill be read, because I am going to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized under such terms and conditions as he may deem proper, to dispose of two bridges, one across the Gila River on the San Carlos Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz., and the other across the San Carlos River on that reservation, constructed in pursuance to a provision in an act approved July 15, 1913 (38 Stat. L. 85), that will no longer be serviceable after the completion of the Coolidge Dam now being constructed across the Gila River, in Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WATERMAN. I object.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am sure I can induce my friend to withhold his objection. Some 15 years ago two bridges were built across the Gila and San Carlos Rivers in Arizona. The construction of the Coolidge Dam will entirely submerge the bridges. I simply wish to have the bill passed in order to give the Secretary of the Interior the power and authority to dispose of the bridges as he sees fit.

Mr. CURTIS. As I understand it, if the bill is not passed at this time it will be too late?

Mr. ASHURST. If the bill is not passed at this session it will be too late.

Mr. CURTIS. That is what I mean.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope my friend will withdraw his objection. I have a favorable report upon it from the Department of the Interior.

Mr. WATERMAN. Does the bill involve the question of granting permits by the water-power commission?

Mr. ASHURST. Not at all. There is nothing whatever of the kind involved.

Mr. WATERMAN. I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 1125, the bill (S. 4229) to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River near and above the city of New Orleans, La.

Mr. CURTIS. Is the bill in regular form?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is a bridge bill in regular form and is recommended by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana?

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "authorize," to insert the words "by act of Congress approved April 17, 1924"; in line 8, to strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and"; in line 9, to strike out the words "as authorized by the act of Congress, approved April 17, 1924"; on page 2, line 2, after the word "extended," to strike out the word "to"; and after line 3, to insert the words "Provided, That it shall not be lawful to continue the construction of said bridge until plans thereof shall again be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River near and above the city of New Orleans, La., authorized by act of Congress approved April 17, 1924, to be built by the city of New Orleans, a municipal corporation existing under the laws of the State of Louisiana, its successors and assigns, through its Public Belt Railroad Commission, is hereby extended five years from the date of the approval hereof: Provided, That it shall not be lawful to continue the construction of said bridge until plans thereof shall again be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OPERATION OF CHAIN-STORE SYSTEM

Mr. BROOKHART. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 224.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 224) submitted by Mr. BROOKHART on the 5th instant, as follows:

Whereas it is estimated that from 1921 to 1927 the retail sales of all chain stores have increased from approximately 4 per cent to 16 per cent of all retail sales; and

Whereas there are estimated to be less than 4,000 chain-stores systems with over 100,000 stores; and

Whereas many of these chains operate from 100 to several thousand stores; and

Whereas there have been numerous consolidations of chain stores throughout the history of the movement, and particularly in the last few years; and

Whereas these chain stores now control a substantial proportion of the distribution of certain commodities in certain cities, are rapidly increasing this proportion of control in these and other cities, and are beginning to extend this system of merchandising into country districts as well; and

Whereas the continuance of the growth of chain-store distribution and the consolidation of such chain stores may result in the development of monopolistic organizations in certain lines of retail distribution; and

Whereas many of these concerns though engaged in interstate commerce in buying may not be engaged in interstate commerce in selling; and

Whereas in consequence, the extent to which such consolidations are now, or should be made, amenable to the jurisdiction of the Federal antitrust laws is a matter of serious concern to the public: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to undertake an inquiry into the chain-store system of marketing and distribution as conducted by manufacturing, wholesaling, retailing, or other types of chain stores and to ascertain and report to the Senate (1) the extent to which such consolidations have been effected in violation of the antitrust laws, if at all; (2) the extent to which consolidations or combinations of such organizations are susceptible to regulation under the Federal Trade Commission act or the antitrust laws, if at all; and (3) what legislation, if any, should be enacted for the purpose of regulating and controlling chain-store distribution.

And for the information of the Senate in connection with the aforesaid subdivisions (1), (2), and (3) of this resolution the commission is directed to inquire into and report in full to the Senate (a) the extent to which the chain-store movement has tended to create a monopoly or concentration of control in the distribution of any commodity either locally or nationally; (b) evidences indicating the existence of unfair methods of competition in commerce or of agreements, conspiracies, or combinations in restraint of trade involving chain-store distribution; (c) the advantages or disadvantages of chain-store distribution in comparison with those of other types of distribution as shown by prices, costs, profits, and margins, quality of goods and services rendered by chain stores and other distributors or resulting from integration, managerial efficiency, low overhead, or other similar causes; (d) how far the rapid increase in the chain-store system of distribution is based upon actual savings in costs of management and operation and how far upon quantity prices available only to chain-store distributors or any class of them; (e) whether or not such quantity prices constitute a violation of either the Federal Trade Commission act, the Clayton Act, or any other statute; and (f) what legislation, if any, should be enacted with reference to such quantity prices.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand that this resolution was submitted some days ago, that it went over under the rule, and has not come up because the Senate has not adjourned since that time.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator insist upon the preamble being retained, or would it be agreeable to him to have the resolution adopted without the preamble?

Mr. BROOKHART. The preamble is quite accurate, I will say, and the statements contained in it are borne out by the facts. I should prefer to have it remain in the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

PUBLIC UTILITIES AND BOULDER DAM

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD three articles, one from the current issue of the Nation, entitled "A million-dollar lobby," another from the Daily News of Washington, D. C., entitled "The Boulder Dam issue," and one from the New York World, entitled "A challenge to Congress."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Nation, May 16, 1928]

THE MILLION-DOLLAR LOBBY

We have occasionally shied bricks in the direction of the reorganized Federal Trade Commission, and we feared that its investigation of the power interests' lobby would amount to little. The gentlemen of the lobby evidently agreed with us, for they toiled manfully to keep the investigation out of the hands of a Senate committee and forced the job on the committee. They expected to control it there. But the investigation personnel of the Federal Trade Commission went out and got the facts and the documents. They did a good job. They uncovered important facts. Despite the best efforts of a sleepy and incompetent press they are making news.

Readers of the Hearst newspapers—another organization which we have often dispraised—know what is being uncovered by the investigation. The Hearst newspapers have told them. Readers of few other papers know, for with amazingly few exceptions the other papers have slurred the story. We suggest that if our readers think it news, as we do, and have not seen it reported, they ask the editors of their local newspapers why.

The joint committee of the National Utilities Association, composed of the National Electric Light Association, the American Gas Association, and the American Electric Railway Association, maintains in Washington a gigantic lobby which in each of the past three years has spent in excess of $1,000,000 to oppose Government ownership—"to represent the utilities companies * * * on all matters of pending legislation before Congress," was the polite phrase used by the joint committee's general counsel. This million-dollar committee has been the heart and soul of the opposition to Federal development of Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam; and it has ex-Senators, ambassadors, ex-governors, newspapermen, and universities on its pay roll.

The lobby paid $7,500 to Richard Washburn Child, former United States Ambassador to Italy, to prepare an unsigned "booklet" opposing Federal development of Boulder Dam. It paid Ernest Greenwood, former American agent of the League of Nations Labor Office, an "initial fee" of $5,000 to write a propaganda book, "Aladdin, U. S. A.," published by Harpers. It paid ex-Senator Lenroot of Wisconsin at least two fees of $10,000 each to lobby for it among his former colleagues. It paid the law firm of Meechem & Vellacott of Albuquerque, N. Mex., $5,299.66 to "report" the governors' conference on Boulder Dam at a time when Merritt Meechem, former governor of New Mexico, was supposed to be representing the State of New Mexico at that conference. It paid the General Federation of Women's Clubs $30,000 for an "urban and rural home survey." It paid the Harvard Graduate School, in three years, $62,000 for "research" which, after study of the views of the responsible professors, it felt safe; and after equally careful study of the professorial field it contributed at least $62,500 (perhaps $95,000) to Northwestern University, $12,249.37 to the University of Michigan, $3,000 to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, $5,000 to Johns Hopkins University, and $33,000 to Howard University. It has 28 committees working in 38 States, teaching that "government ownership is the masked advance agent of communism."

Samuel Insull—the same Insull who tried to buy a seat in the United States Senate for Frank L. Smith of Illinois—is the largest individual contributor to the million-dollar fund, but one-quarter of all the utility companies in the United States contribute to it.

This national committee is only the capstone of the enormous propaganda structure maintained by the public-utility companies. The Illinois Committee on Public Utility Information, founded by Mr. Insull, was one of the pioneers in the field, and it is admitted to have served as a model for the work in more than a score of other States. It was Rob Roy MacGregor of this committee who, when asked how to campaign against a Senator who believed in public ownership, penned the famous memorandum explaining: "My idea would be not to try reason, or logic, but to try to pin the Bolshevik idea on my opponent."

Mr. MacGregor's committee was the pathfinder in work in the public schools. It began with a thorough study of textbooks dealing with public-utility questions. It circularized local companies, urging them to set to work on local school boards and through personal friendships to have "bad" books removed. This, it reported, "is a very slow process, but has to be gone through with." Then it sought to prevent the publication of more "bad" books. It urged its members to work through "personal friends in publishing houses." It wrote letters to the universities and discovered just which professors were writing on the subject. It offered these budding authors the honeyed bait of "reliable statistics" together with aid in getting their books marketed. "We have located," the industrious committee reported, "practically every textbook and also have found the textbooks in course of preparation, and have been able to be of considerable assistance to the writers of these books in providing them with reliable data." Finally, as a result of persistent effort, B. J. Mullaney, of the Illinois committee, was able to report that it had got to the point where "635 Illinois high schools, more than three-quarters of the total number, use specially prepared utility-industries literature in the classrooms."

In Connecticut a similar committee planted more than 10,000 grossly false public-utilities "catechisms" in 76 high schools; and in Pennsylvania 30,000 sets of pamphlets, four to a set, were distributed among county superintendents for use in the schools. Presumably similar practices have been followed in other States, but the witnesses have not yet appeared on the stand.

The energetic Illinois committee not only arranged for its own selected speakers (1,137 speeches in 18 months) and distributed its tons of literature (5,000,000 pieces of literature before it was two years old); it circulated blacklists similar to those used by the D. A. R. in the hope, apparently, of keeping the public-ownership point of view from any expression whatever. It even prepared pamphlets for its agents on how to talk to grade-school pupils.

"Is there any method of publicity not used by your organization?" Judge Healy asked one of the propagandists.

"Only one that I know of," he replied, "and that's sky-writing."

Of course, the newspapers were a rich field for cultivation. Perhaps that explains their lack of interest in the investigation. The Illinois committee mails a weekly news service to 900 newspapers in Illinois. Keeping tab on its utilization has become expensive, but in its first year an average of 5,000 column-inches of material prepared by the utilities committee lobby was printed every month in the Illinois newspapers, and the second year, when the clipping service was discontinued, the rate was running higher still. The New England lobby reported that in 1927, 7,203½ column-inches of its material—enough to fill 56½ eight-column pages of solid reading matter—had appeared in the news columns of New England papers and 1,584 column-inches in the editorial columns!

Mr. Mullaney estimated that the utilities companies spend from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 annually in direct advertising, and all the committees showed themselves insistent that local-utilities advertisers should maintain their contacts with local editors. One of the most disheartening revelations of the investigation was the letter written by the advertising manager of David Lawrence's United States Daily suggesting a $200,000 advertising campaign in that paper and outlining a program by which the bills could be charged to 52 local companies, "so that there could be no possible ground for criticism on the ground that one organization or institution was conducting a general campaign." It is fair to Mr. Lawrence to add that his paper, although somewhat belatedly, has been printing the verbatim testimony before the Federal Trade Commission. Furthermore, it did not get the $200,000 advertising contract.

It has been charged that whole strings of newspapers were to have been bought in the interest of the public utilities. This charge has not been definitely proved. One of the chief buttresses of this charge is the history of Ira C. Copley, an Illinois public-utilities magnate, who in 1926 sold out most of his utilities interests to Samuel Insull and went into the newspaper business. After purchasing one string of newspapers in Illinois he invaded California, buying three papers in San Diego, and immediately killing that one of them which had supported Government ownership. When the charge was made, Mr. Copley published in his papers the statement that—"I have no connection with any public utilities anywhere, and no connection with any companies [other] than the newspaper business anywhere."

One month before making that statement Mr. Copley had resigned as president of the Western United Gas & Electric Co. and of the Southern Illinois Gas Co., and at the time of making it he still held preferred stock of the company to a value of $2,400,000, bonds to a value of $1,000,000, $70,600 in preferred stock of its holding company, and 50,000 shares of no-par-value Class A common stock—enough to assure himself of a directorship at any time he wanted it. Mr. Copley's editors, however, insisted that while they agreed with him in opposition to Government ownership, he had never given them any instructions on the subject and they had written little about it.

The legislatures and the politicians appear in the picture, too. A letter found in the files of Robert V. Prather, secretary-treasurer of various Illinois public-utility associations, read:

"The legislature is in session here, and it looks like a very stormy session, and I could use handily a little 'J. Walker' to very good advantage, and it occurs to me that you could do me a very great favor if the first time you are coming west you would call on a friend of mine in New York and bring me half a dozen."

That was in 1921. In 1925 Mr. Prather wrote another letter suggesting that he needed "something to sweeten up the palates of the legislature." He did not explain whether he wanted "J. Walker" or what.

The gentleman who placed the public-utility catechisms in the Connecticut public schools, the commission discovered, is also the publicity agent of the Republican State committee. J. H. Bigelow, chairman of the Pennsylvania Democratic State committee, got $1,000 from the lobby; John P. Connelly, of Vare's Republican machine in Philadelphia, got $14,103. Walter H. Johnson, chairman of the public-policy committee of the Pennsylvania Electric Association, an avowed lobbyist at the State capital, could not account for $20,225 which had recently passed through his hands. He thought he might have used some of it to watch "pinch bills"—bills introduced by legislators in order to make the utilities "come across."

"Across with what?" he was asked.

"With cash," he replied; but he insisted that he had "fallen for no pincher yet." He explained, however, that he had kept no accounts, because he did not want it known who got his money.

Schools, press, legislatures—the power and utilities gentlemen have flooded the country with money and lies. The Government's investment in Muscle Shoals has been hamstrung and the water still pours idly through Boulder Canyon—tributes to the success of the million-dollar lobby in fighting public development of natural resources.

THE BOULDER DAM ISSUE

This paper believes no measure now pending in Congress is of more importance than the Swing-Johnson Boulder Dam bill.

When this bill first came before Congress it came as a measure for the protection of lives and property from flood and drought. We believed it deserving of support on that basis. There can be no dispute on a policy of life-saving.

But there can be, it has developed, dispute on a protective policy when there is involved with it a question of profit to a great business; and as a test of whether protection for any group of people, now or hereafter, shall depend on possible gain or loss to private capital, this paper believes the Boulder Dam bill infinitely more deserving of support.

This is not all.

Passage of the bill means dollars and cents in the pockets of every taxpayer in the country.

And again, the same principle on which the bill is based, of letting necessary projects pay for themselves when possible, will mean many more dollars and cents in the pockets of taxpayers in the future.

Finally, the passage or nonpassage of this bill will give the country an adequate idea of the present strength of the amazing power lobby and nation-wide propaganda organization which events of the past few months have disclosed.

As soon as possible a dam must be built in the Colorado River for control of floods and storage of water for times of drought.

Even those who are opposing the Swing-Johnson bill realize that.

It is either going to be paid for by the people of the Southwest who will benefit by it, as the Swing-Johnson bill provides, or it is going to be paid for by all the taxpayers of the country, as the power industry desires.

To us it seems there is no more reason for forcing a Federal gratuity upon people willing to pay for safety than there is for forcing free food and lodging upon a man willing to work for it.

And expenditure by the power industry of rate-payers' money to convert them to such an idea seems to us like adding insult to injury.

The Boulder Dam project has been declared sound from an engineering and economic standpoint by some of the greatest engineers and economists of the country.

It does not propose to "put the Government into business" or interfere in any way with legitimate private initiative.

It proposes to utilize the power which will be available at the dam by wholesaling it to cities and private companies. The revenue so derived will pay all the cost of the work.

There are few people who seriously contend the Government ought to usurp the field of business. Likewise there can be few to seriously contend that the Government may not go into a new territory and make its development there self-supporting without injuring any business in so doing.

Because it involves this issue, the measure, now so much more than a local project, is of direct personal interest to each resident of the United States.

The people should protest if its passage is again blocked by a small group of men in Congress.

[From the New York World]

A CHALLENGE TO CONGRESS

On Thursday debate on the Swing-Johnson bill for Boulder Dam was begun in the Senate. This is an important bill. The action which Congress takes on it will answer an important question. If the Senate rejects this bill, its decision will show the country that the power lobby, an organization by no means mythical but openly at work in Washington, is able to dictate the power policies of this Government.

We regard this as a fair statement of the case, by no means exaggerated, for the reason that there is only one point on which the issue is squarely joined—and on this point the interests of the power lobby and the interests of the public are in conflict. No one seriously questions the advisability of building a dam in Boulder Canyon, or, as an alternative, in Black Canyon. The possibility of a disastrous flood in the lower Colorado valley is a constant menace.

Nor does anyone seriously question the advantages which would result from the construction of a dam. There is competent engineering authority behind the statement that a dam will protect against flood a great valley of 400,000 acres lying in a sink several hundred feet below the channel of the river; that it will open another 400,000 acres to irrigation; and that it will develop at least 1,000,000 horsepower for hydroelectric generation.

Finally, there is no real basis for the assertion that the cost of construction would "mulct" the taxpayers of the country. As Senator JOHNSON pointed out in presenting the bill on Thursday, no money is to be advanced until contracts have been made for the delivery of water and of power, assuring the Government repayment of its investment, with interest on its money.

Why, then, is the bill being fought every inch of the way, bitterly and tirelessly, by the power lobby?

Because it permits the Government to build power plants and to operate these power plants on certain terms. The bill does not "put the Government in the power industry," though there is every good reason why the Government should be put in the power industry at Boulder Dam—and the bill would be improved by being so amended. The bill as it stands simply provides that if the Government can not make satisfactory contracts for the sale of power rights, then it may fall back upon Government operation as an alternative rather than surrender these rights on any bargain-counter terms the power companies may choose to name. It is this minimum safeguard which the power lobby wishes to strike out.

One thing is clear: If the power lobby can go to the mat on these terms and win, then Congress has abdicated the field of power legislation and a new legislative body is supreme.

An interesting and important test of authority has begun in Washington.

NAVIGATION ON THE GREAT LAKES

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there are on the calendar two bills which have to do with navigation on the Great Lakes which I should like to have considered and passed at this time. They have been recommended by the Bureau of Navigation; have passed the House of Representatives unanimously, and have been reported by the Committee on Commerce. They should be passed at once if they are to be passed at all, because navigation is about to open on the Lakes, and the provisions of the bills should go into effect promptly.

Mr. CURTIS. Did I understand the Senator to say that the passage of the bill has been asked for by the department?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; by the Bureau of Navigation.

Mr. CURTIS. Very well. Let the titles of the bill be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bills will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 1128, being the bill (H. R. 13032) to amend the act of February 8, 1895, entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters"; and Order of Business 1129, being the bill (H. R. 13037) to amend section 1, rule 2, rule 3, subdivision (e), and rule 9 of an act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters, enacted February 8, 1895 (ch. 64, 28 Stat. L., sec. 645).

Mr. KING. In a word, may I ask the Senator from New York what the bills provide?

Mr. COPELAND. The bills have to do with lights on boats. The boats used to be short, and the law has not been changed since 1895. The boats now in use are so long that it is desired to have better lights so that lights at each end of a boat 400 or 500 feet long may not be thought to be simply channel lights. That is all.

Mr. KING. Has not the Bureau of Navigation now all the necessary authority to deal with the subject?

Mr. COPELAND. No; not where the boats are more than 30 tons.

Mr. KING. The bills will not disturb the regulations with respect to tonnage, weights, and so forth?

Mr. COPELAND. Not at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to consideration of the first bill mentioned by the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13032) to amend the act of February 8, 1895, entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters," which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That rule 7 of the act of Congress approved February 8, 1895, entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters," be amended so as to read as follows:

"RULE 7. The lights for tugs under 100 tons register (net), whose principal business is harbor towing, and for boats navigating only on the River St. Lawrence, also ferryboats, rafts, and canal boats, shall be regulated by rules which have been or may hereafter be prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels."

SEC. 2. All laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect on and after its approval.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13037) to amend section 1, rule 2; rule 3, subdivision (e); and rule 9 of an act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters, enacted February 8, 1895 (ch. 64, 28 Stat. L., sec. 645), which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That rule 2, rule 3, subdivision (e), and rule 9 of section 1 of an act entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters," enacted February 8, 1895, and being chapter 64, Twenty-eighth Statutes at Large, section 645, be, and the same are, respectively, hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"Rule 2. The lights mentioned in the following rules, and no others which may be mistaken for the prescribed lights, shall be exhibited in all weathers from sunset to sunrise. The word 'visible' in these rules, when applied to lights, shall mean visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere.

"Rule 3, subdivision (e). A steamer of over 150 feet register length shall carry also, when under way, a bright white light so fixed as to throw the light all around the horizon, and of such character as to be visible at a distance of at least 3 miles. Such light shall be placed in line with the keel at least 15 feet higher from the deck and more than 75 feet abaft the light mentioned in subdivision (e); or in lieu thereof two such lights of the same character and height as herein described placed not over 30 inches apart horizontally, one on either side of the keel, and so arranged that one or the other or both shall be visible from any angle of approach.

"Rule 9. A vessel under 150 feet register length, when at anchor, shall carry forward, where it can best be seen, but at a height not exceeding 20 feet above the hull, a white light constructed so as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light visible all around the horizon at a distance of at least 1 mile.

"A vessel of 150 feet or upward in register length, when at anchor, shall carry in the forward part of the vessel two white lights at the same height of not less than 20 and not exceeding 40 feet above the hull and not less than 10 feet apart horizontally and athwartships, except that each need not be visible all around the horizon, but so arranged that one or the other, or both, shall show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light and be visible from any angle of approach at a distance of at least 1 mile; and at or near the stern of the vessel two similar lights similarly arranged and at such a height that they shall not be less than 15 feet lower than the forward lights. In addition the 4 anchor lights above specified, at least 1 white deck light shall be displayed in every interval of 100 feet along the deck, measuring from the forward lights, said deck lights to be not less than 2 feet above the deck and arranged, so far as intervening structures will permit, so as to be visible from any angle of approach."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLARENCE D. CHAMBERLIN AND CHARLES A. LEVINE

Mr. BROOKHART. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 3944) authorizing the President to present, in the name of Congress, a medal of honor to Clarence D. Chamberlin. I ask unanimous consent for immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to award, in the name of Congress, gold medals of appropriate design to Clarence D. Chamberlain, pilot, and Charles A. Levine, organizer and participant, for their extraordinary achievement in making the first successful nonstop airplane flight from the United States to Germany, in June, 1927.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the President to present, in the name of Congress, gold medals of appropriate design to Clarence D. Chamberlain and Charles A. Levine."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, May 12, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We praise Thee, O God, our Heavenly Father, that there is a day in our Nation's calendar dedicated to holy motherhood. To-morrow we shall wear in her memory the beautiful flower, as from its depths is reflected the heavenly purity of her divine soul. O God, from her came our first pulse beat; her angel arms were our first cradle; at her knees she first formed our hands in prayer; from her trembling lips God's word first fell like a divine presence, felt and seen; through the years of our helplessness she gave us our first stir of might. How she poured into our wonder minds the ways of life; and as long as her lips are untouched by death she prayed for her child. Oh, her prayers were as holy incense lifting from the altar of her soul. Blessed Lord, even at eternity's gate her face gleams like a star on the breast of night, waiting for the home-coming of her own. Help us to so live that the beautiful spirit of motherhood shall blossom everywhere and bring forth fruits of noble deeds and holy living. O tell us, Father, that the nation that desires eternity must exalt maternity. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE TARIFF AND AGRICULTURE

Mr. SELVIG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the tariff and agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. SELVIG. Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting an opportunity to present to the House of Representatives a very important subject, that of the protective tariff with reference to agriculture, and am glad of the opportunity to do so at this time.

In the last campaign I stated that the protection given by the tariff duties on agricultural imports was of very great importance to the farmers of the United States. As my district, the Red River Valley district of Minnesota, is predominantly agricultural, it is an issue of the greatest importance to the welfare and prosperity of those living on the 28,000 farms in the district and to the townspeople who depend upon agriculture for their livelihood.

It is interesting to compare the treatment accorded agriculture under the last three tariff acts—the acts of 1913, 1921, and 1922. Of these the acts of 1921 and 1922 were passed by a Republican majority in Congress, while the act of 1913, the Underwood Act, was passed when the Democrats were in power.

In this act of 1913 we find that a large number of agricultural imports were placed on the duty-free list. This means that anyone living outside of the United States could freely and without paying an import duty at the port of entry compete directly and on an even basis against the United States farmer.

DUTY-FREE TARIFF SCHEDULES

Let us look at some of these schedules in the 1913 tariff act. The free-of-duty schedule included fresh beef and veal, live cattle, oleo stearin, tallow, fresh goat meat, goats, fresh lamb and mutton, sheep, bacon and hams, lard, lard compounds and substitutes, fresh pork, pork shoulders and other pork, prepared or preserved, swine, fresh and prepared meats, cream, milk, condensed and evaporated milk, eggs of poultry in the shell, buckwheat, corn, corn flour and meal, rye, rye flour, wheat, cracked wheat, wheat flour, cottonseed, soya beans, alfalfa and clover seeds, potatoes, wool, and vegetable oils.

These free-of-duty schedules opened wide the American markets to foreign importations. In other words, under this Democratic tariff law the American farmer was placed in direct competition with the farmers of the tropical regions, of the Orient, South America, Europe, and elsewhere.

The rates of duty on other important farm products in the tariff act of 1913 were in many cases so low that very little, if any, protection was afforded the farmers of the United States against disastrous competition from other countries.

Not only were the duty-free imports dumped against our farmers, but there were large importations of agricultural products on which the Democratic tariff rates were unthinkably low. Let me cite a few of these schedules.

TARIFF ACT OF 1913

In the act of 1913 the duty on butter was only 2½ cents per pound. Live poultry was 1 cent per pound. Dead poultry, 2 cents per pound. Egg albumen, dried, 3 cents per pound; frozen, 1 cent per pound. Egg yolk, 10 per cent ad valorem. Dried whole eggs, 10 cents per pound; frozen, 2 cents per pound. Barley, 15 cents per bushel. Oats, 6 cents per bushel. Apples, apricots, berries, peaches, plums, and prunes, 1 cent per pound. Hay, $2 per ton. Straw, 50 cents per ton. Flaxseed, 20 cents per bushel. Sugar and molasses had very low import rates.

The farmers have never been accorded adequate protection by a Democratic tariff. The effects of the 1913 act were not felt during the war years. Commerce on the high seas during war time was almost completely stopped. War-time conditions placed upon the Allies the almost superhuman task of providing food not only for the allied armies but for the civilian population of a large part of Europe as well.

HEAVY IMPORTATIONS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Shortly after the close of the war, in the years 1919 and 1920, the disastrous effects of this tariff policy began to be felt. Millions upon millions of pounds of agricultural products were unloaded at American ports and sold in competition with the products of our deflated farmers, creating an agricultural crisis in the United States unprecedented in its severity.

We recall wool being sold for from 8 to 10 cents per pound. Shiploads of frozen meats arrived at our ports, glutting an already everfilled market. Wheat went down to 84 cents per bushel. Butter was shipped in by the boatloads. The list could be greatly extended, but time does not permit.

The first task confronting the Republican Party, following the election of 1920, was to remedy the serious condition in which our farmers found themselves. Unemployment prevailed, still further aggravating the situation.

THE EMERGENCY TARIFF ACT

The first step was the enactment of the emergency tariff act of 1921 passed after the Republican Party was again in control of the Government. This act raised nearly all of the agricultural schedules and stopped to a great extent the tremendous importations of competitive agricultural products from being marketed in the United States. This emergency tariff act was later followed by the tariff act of 1922, which is now in force.

Limitations of time and space do not permit me to list all the agricultural tariff schedules in the present act, much as I should like to do so. I shall, however, place in the RECORD a table showing the present tariff rates and the rates in the 1913 Underwood Act on those agricultural products in which the farmers of the Middle West are chiefly concerned.

It is not maintained that the tariff is fully effective on products or commodities of which we produce an exportable surplus. The surplus control bill which Congress has considered is designed to make the tariff fully effective on such crops and commodities. But even on the so-called surplus crops and products the problem of the American farmer would be vastly aggravated if competitive imports were admitted free of duty or if the rate of duty were less than in the present tariff law.

TARIFF ACT OF 1922

In studying the agricultural schedules of the 1922 tariff act, I read very carefully the testimony presented in the hearings before the House Committee on Ways and Means and the Senate Finance Committee when the present tariff act was in the course of preparation.

I was impressed in reading these committee hearings with the fact that the farmers and the farm organizations were not fully and adequately represented before those committees. The tariff needs of agriculture were not fully presented when that bill was being drawn. I attribute this condition to the fact that the entire agricultural industry at that time was in a state of postwar confusion and chaos. The national farm organizations had not made a full and complete study of the agricultural tariff schedules. As a result, those engaged in handling food products occupied more of the time before the committee than did the actual producers or organizations of producers.

Even if this is true, and the testimony before the committee bears this out, it is also true that the 1922 tariff act is the best one in so far as the agricultural schedules are concerned that was ever placed on the statute books of the United States.

TARIFF READJUSTMENT NEEDED

In the light of present-day conditions, however, the 1922 act leaves much to be desired. There must be a readjustment of agricultural tariff schedules.

Agricultural conditions were not normal in 1921 when the present tariff act was in the course of preparation. To-day we know more about present trends and conditions. There was not available in 1922 dependable data upon which to base agricultural tariff rates which would afford the protection to American agriculture that the farmers deserved.

There is a widespread need and demand that the agricultural schedules in the existing tariff law be modified to meet more nearly the situation which exists to-day. This demand centers on the necessity of materially increasing the duties on competitive agricultural imports. In all the discussions of the current agricultural problem the adjustment of tariff rates to give the farmers adequate protection is emphasized.

DAIRY FARMERS ARE MENACED

The dairy farmer realizes that about 60 per cent of the imports for 1927 were products directly affecting the sale of our agricultural products and that not only the price of butter, milk, cream, cheese, milk powder, casein, and other milk products but also many other items that are products of the farm were being affected by the fact that there was inadequate tariff protection.

It is generally admitted that world conditions have changed materially since the enactment of the tariff act of 1922. International competition with respect to dairy fats and vegetable oils and the raw materials from which such oils are extracted has become intensified. The present tariff act is no longer adequate to equalize the competitive conditions as between the agricultural producers of the United States and those of foreign countries or to maintain the economic parity of our agricultural producers with other industries.

VEGETABLE OILS ON FREE LIST

The tariff act of 1922 is also glaringly defective in that some important commodities among the vegetable oils and raw materials remain on the free list.

The operation of the tariff act has been further handicapped by its inapplicability to imports of products grown in the Philippine Islands. As a result the huge volume of these imports has tended to weaken and break down the protection which would otherwise be afforded by existing rates on these commodities.

The producers of other agricultural products, as well as the dairy farmers, are facing similar adverse competitive conditions resulting from the same general causes.

A study of the present tariff act reveals that the rates on agricultural products are generally much lower than the rates on manufactured products, that such inequalities have been partly contributory to the subnormal purchasing power of agricultural products, and that from 59 to 62 per cent of the total annual imports into the United States are agricultural products.

In support of the above statement that the rates on agricultural products are generally much lower than the rates on manufactured products, I will place in the RECORD a table showing certain typical import duties on agricultural and industrial products. The percentagee indicate the ad valorem equivalents of the present import duties as reported by the Department of Commerce.

HEAVY IMPORTATIONS OF FARM PRODUCTS

Examination also reveals that a most serious cause of the agricultural depression is the enormous importation of foreign farm products, in competition with the products of the American farms.

In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, the United States imported a total of over $3,500,000,000 worth of raw and manufactured animal and vegetable products. Of this amount, about $1,000,000,000 represented imports of tea, coffee, cocoa, rubber, and other farm products that America can not raise, or for which we can not provide workable substitutes. But this still leaves a balance of $2,500,000,000 of agricultural and animal imports, of the classes that can, to a very large extent, be advantageously grown and produced in the United States, or for which working substitutes can be produced.

Seventy-nine per cent of all American imports last year were of animal and agricultural products and only 21 per cent were of all other products. During the same year $2,350,000,000, or over two-thirds, of all our imports of animal and agricultural products were admitted free of duty.

During the above fiscal year, while the United States imported farm products totaling $3,508,400,000, we exported farm products totaling only $2,510,500,000 or an excess of imports over exports of farm products of practically $1,000,000,000.

HEAVY COMPETITIVE IMPORTS

We imported, according to available information, $1,500,000,000 more of farm products than we exported of minerals, manufactures, chemicals, and other products.

The above figures should make it plain to everyone that our foreign trade policy, or lack of policy, needs a thorough overhauling.

People who have not given much consideration to the subject may say that we ought to consider our agricultural imports only to the extent of their excess over our agricultural exports. That is not so, because there are many such exports that are sold at a loss, a loss not limited to the quantity of the product exported, not applying only on the small percentage of the export business, but on the entire American production of that commodity.

The amount of our agricultural imports, more than $3,500,000,000, per year is out of all proper proportion to the annual national farm income, now about $10,000,000,000.

TARIFF ADJUSTMENT BILLS INTRODUCED

Several bills were introduced at this session of Congress which seek to give the American farmers adequate tariff protection. They all propose increased duties on agricultural imports. I am inserting in the RECORD the schedules of H. R. 9357, that I introduced on January 16, 1928, and a brief synopsis of the bills introduced by Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa (H. R. 9765; Mr. WURZBACH, of Texas (H. R. 9856); and Mr. MANLOVE, of Missouri (H. R. 11416). Many other members of the House have introduced bills aiming to correct the present inequality in protection afforded agriculture.

OTHER TARIFF BILLS INTRODUCED

In the Dickinson bill (H. R. 9765) the import rate per pound on cattle is increased from 1½ and 2 cents to 3 and 4 cents; fresh veal and beef from 3 cents to 6 cents; tallow from one-half cent to 3 cents; oleo oil from 1 cent to 3 cents; dry cattle hides from free list to 5 cents; wet cattle hides from free list to 4 cents; dry calfskins from free list to 16 cents; wet calfskins from free list to 10 cents; swine and fresh pork from one-half cent to 3 cents; bacon and hams from 2 cents to 4 cents; lard from 1 cent to 2 cents; meat extracts from 15 cents to 30 cents; corn from 15 cents to 30 cents per bushel.

Cocoa or cacao beans are made dutiable at 3 cents per pound; oilcake, 2 cents; coconut oil, palm oil, palm-kernel oil, and peanut oil, each at 4 cents per pound.

The Manlove bill (H. R. 11416) includes, with slight changes, the livestock schedules listed above in the Dickinson bill, and the dairy and poultry schedules listed above in the Selvig bill. In addition it increases the tariff on vegetables, fruits, potatoes, hay, and straw. The schedules of the Manlove bill were printed in full in the RECORD, March 1, 1928, pages 3892 and 3893.

The Wurzbach bill (H. R. 9856) includes peanuts, walnuts, pecans, onions, garlic, tomatoes, tomato paste, vegetables, jute and bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and similar fabrics.

The Timberlake resolution (H. J. Res. 214) would limit the importation of sugar from the Philippine Islands to 500,000 tons annually to protect our American cane and beet-sugar growers.

These bills all have the same objective. They are supplementary to each other and present a well-thought-out program for giving the American farmers a more equitable measure of protection against foreign imports of farm and food products.

M'MASTER RESOLUTION

In this connection I wish to say a word about the much-discussed McMaster resolution. This resolution passed by the Senate had no significance as to tariff revision, except that it carried a threat of downward revision to those interested in the industrial schedules of the tariff law. It directed a revision of the tariff downward only. Before we resort to that we must try to attain equality between industry and agriculture by revising the agricultural schedules upward.

There may be some industrial schedules that can stand a downward revision, but we should proceed very carefully, with full consideration, and not in spite or chagrin, for we may destroy valuable industries and cause unnecessary unemployment of labor.

American industrial labor is the very best customer of the American farmer, and we must take no step that will have any tendency to impoverish labor. Holding these views, I voted against the McMaster resolution, and was happy to note that those distinguished western leaders of agricultural thought, Senators MCNARY and GOODING, voted against it on the Senate side.

EARLY ACTION IS NECESSARY

Congress now faces the duty of speedily enacting increased agricultural tariff schedules into law. Not to do so places our American farmers at the mercy of foreign producers. The importation of vegetable oils is a menace to our dairy and livestock farmers that but very few fully realize to-day.

This importation is increasing yearly. In many cases these oil-producing products are admitted free of duty, including vast imports from the Philippines. Enormous quantities pay a low duty—so low that it does not appreciably affect the volume of imports. American-made dairy products, especially butter, are seriously menaced through the competition by margarine made from coconut oil, soya-bean oil, sesame oil, whale oil, palm-kernel oil, perilla oil, or other tropical and oriental oils which can be laid down at our doors at 6 or 7 or 8 cents a pound after paying ocean freight and big profits to importers.

The labor which produces the materials and gathers the copra or soya bean or other oil-bearing seeds will work for a few cents an hour or a handful of silver for a month. I shall cite specific figures regarding this later.

THE MENACE OF VEGETABLE OILS

This is the ever-present menace that confronts the producers of the health-giving vitamins, absolutely essential to human growth and indispensible to growing children, contained in butter, which is the most valuable and purest edible fat known to science.

Let us look at the figures of importations of these vegetable oils for 1926:

	Pounds
Prepared and unprepared coconut oil, admitted free from the Philippines	592,000,000
Tung oil	101,550,000
Soya-bean oil	17,403,815
Peanuts, imported for oil	120,158,000
Various other oils	84,202,000

Vegetable lard substitutes, margarine, and other products made from these duty-free imports strike directly at our hog raisers and dairy farmers. This situation must be remedied at once.

Capital furnished by United States financiers is invested in foreign lands where, with the cheap labor of the Orient and the Tropics, it is used to increase the annual production of these commodities, much of which is intended for importation into the United States. Our own citizens and financiers in many instances help to forge the weapon which is being used tellingly and with disastrous effects against our own farmers.

In this connection I will insert in the RECORD a table showing the materials used in the manufacture of oleomargarine from 1916 to 1926:

Vegetable oils also cut down the corn market. Soaps, oleomargarine, lard substitutes, and other vegetable oil products can be made in part from corn oil. Instead, these products are mostly made from duty-free vegetable oils. Our corn production should be protected so that the surplus can be utilized for domestic consumption.

AGRICULTURE NEEDS ENCOURAGEMENT

Most of our people are agreed that American agriculture should receive the utmost encouragement not only from our own Government, but also from the financiers of the land. We need not go far back in history to note what happens when agriculture is demoralized and when industry is permitted to have the upper hand.

An impoverished rural population gives no promise of sustained purchasing power. Abject poverty in our rural areas can not but induce low standards elsewhere.

Our plea is for a balanced production both in industry and in agriculture. To secure this our farmers must be given adequate protection against the products of low-cost, low-standard competition.

I stated at the beginning that the present tariff act gives to the dairy and livestock farmers the best and most effective protection ever accorded that industry. In spite of this, however, there were imported, during 1926, 60,000,000 dozen eggs, 62,400,000 pounds of cheese, 62,000,000 pounds of meats, 22,000,000 pounds of hides, and 334,000,000 pounds of wool into the United States in competition against our own farmers. I will place in the RECORD a more complete table of agricultural imports and the present trend of imports.

Sheep raising in the United States was restored as a result of the 1922 tariff act, but we are still importing nearly one-half the wool consumed.

TARIFF ON BUTTER

The present tariff on butter has been of great benefit to our dairy farmers. Please bear in mind that this tariff was only 3½ cents per pound under the Democratic tariff. It was raised to 8 cents per pound under the Republican tariff of 1922 and later increased to 12 cents per pound by the order of the President, following an exhaustive investigation by the Tariff Commission. My colleagues in the House from Minnesota were active in securing this increase, which was put into effect in 1926.

TARIFF AID IN SOLVING SURPLUS PROBLEM

The agricultural problem will be greatly alleviated when the acreage and man power required for producing these vast quantities of agricultural products that are annually imported are used for that purpose instead of for producing surplus crops of wheat, oats, barley, rye, and the other products in excess of our domestic requirements.

The tariff bills heretofore mentioned will, if enacted into law, remedy to a large degree the unequal status of the farmer who pays the costs of running his farm on a domestic price basis and at the same time is forced to meet the price of his foreign competitors on a world market basis when he sells his products.

These bills also remove from the free list the directly competitive vegetable oils and provide in place tariff duties that will be adequately protective. Restricting these importations will increase the effective demand for lard produced right here in the United States, as well as for dairy fats, cottonseed oil, corn oil, and peanut and soya-bean oil, all of which are produced in this country.

By limiting the importation of Cuban blackstrap molasses now used in preparing stock-food mixtures, the demand for corn will be increased and a market for 50,000,000 bushels annually will be created.

DOUBLE THE TARIFF ON CORN

The tariff on corn should be doubled. The tariff on dairy products should be increased up to a rate with an ad valorem equivalent to at least 40 per cent. This is less than the average rate that industry enjoys.

The importation of meats for consumption should be restricted entirely, thereby discouraging the export of American capital for the purpose of exploitation and of increasing foreign production of meat products financed by American money and intended for import into the United States.

INCREASE THE TARIFF ON FLAX

Increase the tariff on flax and linseed oil, and prohibit the importation of mixtures of linseed and other oils, which enable the importer to avoid payment of the present duty on linseed oil. This will result in placing at least 2,000,000 additional acres in flax production, thereby reducing the acreage in wheat and other small grains and decreasing the production of surplus crops.

Encourage the production of starch from potatoes and from corn by placing a prohibitive duty on imported starch.

Give the American farmer a protective duty on hides and skins. The imports of these last year were valued at $112,856,146.

WE IMPORT OUR SURPLUS

It has been well said that the surplus does not come chiefly from American farmers. We import our surplus. Here is a partial list:

Peanut oil and low-grade eggs from China. Coconut oil from the Philippines. Cattle hides and flax from Argentina and Canada. Remember that one-third of our hides and one-half of our flax are imported.

Cheese from Switzerland and Italy. Eight hundred thousand cows were displaced by our dairy imports in 1926. Wool from Australia. The clip of 26,000,000 sheep was unloaded at our ports of entry in 1926. It is well to call to mind that one-half our total wool consumption is imported. Silk from Japan. Fruit, nuts, eggs, vegetables, rice, and many other products from all the corners of the world.

One billion five hundred million dollars' worth of competitive imports were sold in the United States in 1926.

The competition of these imports lowered the price of every important food product in the United States.

It forced us to export heavily to foreign markets, which cheapened the entire output of our American farmers. I will place in the RECORD here a table showing imports into the United States of competing commodities for 1926 and 1927:

WAGES PAID FOREIGN AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

Before closing I wish to refer briefly to the wages paid in competing agricultural countries, as this gives an additional reason for extending to our American farmers adequate protective rates on agricultural imports. Dairy products are imported from Denmark. Cheese from Switzerland. Many agricultural imports come from Italy and also from China. I will confine the discussion to the wages of farm workers in those countries.

WAGES OF DANISH FARM WORKERS

The average daily wages of Danish farm workers permanently employed and boarding themselves were recently reported. In 1913 the average per day was 67 cents; in 1919–20, $1.18; in 1920–21, $1.29; in 1921–22, $1.33; in 1922–23, $1.01; in 1923–24, 92 cents; in 1924–25, $1.02.

ITALIAN FARM WORKERS

In Italy the average wages paid agricultural workers in 1914 was 43 cents per day. In 1921, 60 cents per day.

FARM WORKERS IN SWITZERLAND

In Switzerland the average wages of farm workers in 1925 is indicated by the following:

Milker, per week, $4.39; horseman, $4.12; plowman, $3.05; hired man, $1.38; hired woman, $2.21; day laborer, at harvest (without board and lodging), per day, $1.55; other than at harvest time, $1.32 per day.

FARM LABOR IN CHINA

Labor is plentiful and consequently cheap in China, according to the August, 1921, Monthly Labor Review. In the Shanghai district an able-bodied male receives on an average 24 cents per day. In the Nanking district, 8 cents to 21 cents per day. In the Peking district, 3 cents to 34 cents per day. In the Tai-Yuen district, 6 cents to 20 cents per day. In the Amoy district, 17 cents to 34 cents per day. Women laborers receive approximately one-half to two-thirds of the wages paid to the men.

WAGES IN THE UNITED STATES AND EUROPE

Contrast the above with the wages paid in the United States. The protective-tariff system is a factor in supporting a higher wage level here than exists elsewhere in the world. The higher purchasing power which naturally results is of great importance to the farmers who dispose of 90 per cent of their production in the domestic market.

In 1924, according to the United States Bureau of Labor report, the average daily wage in the United States was $5.60; in England, $2.60 per day; in Germany, $1.55 per day; in Belgium, $1.29 per day; in France, $1.01 per day; and in Italy, 90 cents per day.

The farmers want the wage earners to have a high buying power. Imagine the condition of our farmers if the 90 per cent of their annual production which is consumed within this country were sold to wage earners who received only an average of 90 cents per day, as in Italy; or $1.01 per day, as in France; or $1.29 per day, as in Belgium; or $1.55 per day, as in Germany; or even $2.60 per day, as in England, which is less than half the United States average wage scale as reported by the Labor Bureau.

How would our farmers fare under such conditions?

FARMERS ARE INTERESTED IN PROTECTIVE TARIFF

About 90 per cent of American agricultural production is directly affected by foreign competition. This is the reason the American farmer is so vitally concerned with our tariff-protection policy. This foreign competition affects the farmers in two ways—on the foreign market, where we export, or in the domestic markets into which we import.

Wool and hides, for example, enter the United States from all parts of the world, and compete in the United States with domestic production. Producers of butter, onions, prunes, and hemp are just as much affected. The prices received for farm products are determined in part by the volume and quality of the foreign production.

PROTECTIVE TARIFF BENEFITS

American statesmen are all agreed that our first duty is to the American people by maintaining their standards of living from destruction through prevention of dumping in the markets of our land of the manufactures and of agricultural commodities produced by cheaper labor living under lower standards of living abroad.

Such importations tear down the prosperity and the well-being of the United States.

Protective tariff has increased American prosperity. Protective tariff has increased the domestic production of flax, wool, sugar. Our domestic consumption is increasing faster than the population. If the American farmer could have his domestic market to himself the law of supply and demand will run directly in his favor.

Removal or lessening the tariff on agricultural products would be a death blow to our rural communities. It would result in lessened purchasing power, poorer schools, poorer homes, larger burdens, and longer hours.

It is unthinkable that the great American people would approve such a policy.

It is inevitable that the failure to provide adequate protection against foreign imports will result in a lower standard of living in the country than in the city. It follows that if the farmer's protection shrinks the share of labor will shrink. The welfare of both of these classes is interdependent. There must be jobs for the worker in order to give a profitable home market to the farmer.

Labor wants steady employment, increased real wages, better conditions of living, and a fair scale of living costs.

The farmer wants fully employed labor and protection from foreign competition.

THE ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the St. Lawrence deep waterway, and as a part of that extension I ask permission to include letter from the Canadian Government dated September 1, 1927, and the answer by Mr. Kellogg, Secretary of State, dated October 17, 1927, and also certain correspondence between myself and the Secretary of State and a letter written by myself to the St. Lawrence Tidewater Association and its reply, the whole not to occupy more than three or four pages of the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERHILL. On what subject?

Mr. PEAVEY. On the subject of the international waterway.

Mr. UNDERHILL. About how many columns of the RECORD would it occupy?

Mr. PEAVEY. It would not cover more than three pages of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I am making this statement that the people of Wisconsin may be informed about my activities as their Representative in Congress on a subject of vital importance to them.

The most important question before the people of Wisconsin and the entire Northwest to-day is the building of the St. Lawrence waterway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean. In order that the waterway may be built it is necessary that a treaty be negotiated with Canada to provide for its construction and a proper division of the costs as well as a partition of the hydroelectric power, navigation, and other benefits to accrue to both countries.

The building of the St. Lawrence waterway will not only mean the opening of world commerce and trade to the interior of America but it will to a large degree restore general commerce to the cities and harbors on the Great Lakes. General commerce on the Great Lakes not only means cheap transportation but it would mean reduced transportation charges on everything the people of the Northwest produce for sale and a consequent low freight rate on manufactured goods purchased from the East.

It would mean a saving to the farmers and business men of 21 Northwestern States of over $123,000,000 annually. Forty million people living in those States are demanding it and have been for the past 25 years. No one excepting a few selfish interests in New York have ever opposed the waterway. I ask, Why the delay?

Every dollar needlessly spent for transportation by the people of the Northwest is a dollar lost. According to the St. Lawrence commission, appointed by the President, the annual loss to the people living in the Great Lakes States is computed to be over a hundred million dollars on excessive freight rates on grain alone.

This is just so much human toil and energy going to waste each year. It means people living in the Northwest must be content with $125,000,000 less annual business and to do without the consequent happiness and prosperity this vast sum would bestow.

Every official action and pronouncement pertaining to the building of the St. Lawrence waterway has been to delay and forestall progress. Why?

The Senate amendment of 1909 created the joint commission and took the waterway out of the hands of Congress for 19 years. My resolution, which was drawn last January, the introduction of which was withheld until now at the suggestion of Frank B. Kellogg, Secretary of State, is the first move made since 1909 to get this matter back before Congress, where the business of the public belongs. The resolution follows:

[H. Res. 185, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

Whereas it appears that of all the legislative and other proposals which have been submitted for the governmental relief of agriculture in the Middle and Northwestern States the development of a waterway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean would be the most practical and economically sound; and

Whereas every engineering body and commission, including the United States-St. Lawrence Commission, appointed to study the potentialities of such a waterway have, without exception, submitted favorable reports; and

Whereas the building of such a waterway would alleviate the present agricultural depression of the mid-continent through lessening the economic handicap of adverse transportation costs; and

Whereas the legislatures of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin have all passed joint resolutions calling upon the President of the United States for immediate action in the building of a waterway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean via the St. Lawrence River, which resolutions have been supported and indorsed by 10 additional Northwestern States, and by a petition of a representative New England committee, consisting of prominent citizens of Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the report submitted by the United States-St. Lawrence Commission on December 27, 1926, known as Senate Document No. 183, upon the development of a waterway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean via the St. Lawrence River, be adopted as the policy of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Senate concurring, and that the President and the Secretary of State be requested to conclude negotiations for a treaty that will permit the early completion of such a waterway.

It took the joint commission, created under the act of 1909, 14 years to prepare a report to Congress. Then another commission was created, headed by Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, which commission took nearly four years to present a report made by the Department of United States Engineers.

These two St. Lawrence commissions and their activities have cost the Government of the United States from 1909 to December, 1926, more than $1,000,000 in salaries and expenses. For the most part their reports and recommendations and facts on which they were based were made by the United States Engineers, paid by the War Department, and requiring about three years' actual preparation. I ask you again, Why all this delay?

It must be apparent to any student of this great problem that the illegal and unwarranted diversion of water from Lake Michigan by the sanitary district of Chicago is, to a large extent, the key to the whole situation.

Were it not for this illegal diversion and for the several million dollars a year unjust and unrighteous money collected through the sale of hydroelectric power by the Chicago Sanitary District, no serious difficulties would be encountered in our negotiations with Canada. Were it not for the intolerable and corrupt use of these same millions to influence Congress to thwart legislation and defeat any move to curb or stop this act of international thievery, the St. Lawrence waterway might now be under construction.

Were the waterway to be built, no city in the continent would profit as would Chicago, because of its dominating position on the Great Lakes. A few unscrupulous and unprincipled politicians banded together under the posthumous institution known as the Chicago Sanitary District are being allowed to set aside the State laws, defy national authority, injure the whole Northwest and Canada, and destroy the future progress of Chicago itself to satisfy individual profit and greed. That the people who care to know may have the entire facts, I am inserting below the official correspondence between Frank B. Kellogg,

Secretary of State, and the Canadian minister. These letters speak for themselves:

CANADIAN LEGATION,
Washington, September 1, 1927.

SIR: I have the honor to refer to the note which you addressed to Mr. Chilton on December 7, 1926, regarding the publication of certain correspondence relating to the diversion of water from Lake Michigan by the Sanitary District of Chicago.

His Majesty's Government in Canada has noted that the Government of the United States considers that the reference in the report of the Joint Board of Engineers on the St. Lawrence waterway project to the limited effect on lake levels of the diversion of water through the Chicago sanitary canal greatly alters the understanding of the situation, and that it might accordingly be considered undesirable to publish the correspondence in question.

I have been instructed to inform you that His Majesty's Government in Canada has not been under any misapprehension as to the extent to which the abstraction of water through the Chicago sanitary canal has lowered the levels of the Great Lakes and that it has been fully advised that this lowering has been in the neighborhood of 6 inches. The papers which His Majesty's Government in Canada desires to publish incorporate its viewpoint with respect to the general principle of abstracting water from the Great Lakes system and diverting it into another watershed, and include the protests of the Government of Canada against the abstraction, submitted on behalf of the people of Canada generally, as well as the protest of the government of Ontario, submitted on behalf of the people of that Province. Any reference in the report of the Joint Board of Engineers as published as to the actual effect of the withdrawal of water through the sanitary canal does not in any degree whatsoever affect the viewpoint of His Majesty's Government in Canada as expressed in this correspondence.

His Majesty's Government in Canada desires to take this opportunity of pointing out that if any misapprehension exists in the United States or in Canada as to the degree of lowering occasioned by the Chicago abstraction the publication of these papers will go a long way toward removing such misunderstanding.

With reference to the suggestion that His Majesty's Government in Canada enter upon a further discussion of the practical question of providing compensatory works as recommended by the Joint Board of Engineers, it may be pointed out that the installation of compensatory works for the restoration of lake levels will in no way recoup to the Great Lakes system the power which is lost to that system by the water abstracted therefrom through the sanitary canal. While recognizing the marked advantages which may be gained by the construction of suitable compensating works, His Majesty's Government in Canada would not be prepared to enter upon a discussion of any plans for the construction of such works if this course involved an assumption that the present abstraction is to continue.

With reference, however, to the question immediately under consideration, His Majesty's Government in Canada observes nothing in the report of the Joint Engineering Board, including appendices, which would render inadvisable the publication of the papers in question. On the contrary, it is considered that the release of these papers would have a marked effect in clarifying public opinion on the question in both countries.

I have the honor, therefore, to inquire whether the Government of the United States would not be prepared to publish the correspondence listed in Mr. Chilton's note of November 16, 1926, together with subsequent correspondence, at such early date as may be found convenient to both Governments.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir,
Your most obedient, humble servant,

LAURENT BEAUDRY,
Chargé d'Affaires.

The Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
Secretary of State of the United States, Washington.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1927.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note No. 230 of September 1, 1927, inquiring whether this Government would be prepared to make public certain correspondence in regard to the diversion of water from Lake Michigan by the Sanitary District of Chicago.

The proposal made by the Canadian Government that the correspondence be made public has been referred to the authorities of this Government directly concerned with the matter to which the correspondence relates. I shall be glad to inform you at the earliest date possible of the views of this Government in regard to the publication of the correspondence.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

Mr. LAURENT BEAUDRY,
Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of the Dominion of Canada.

OCTOBER 17, 1927.

SIR: In further reply to your legation's note, No. 230, of September 1, I have the honor to inform you that this Government raises no objection to the publication of the correspondence referred to therein, relating to the diversion of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago.

This Government has not failed to recognize the importance of the contentions made by the Canadian Government relating to the abstraction of water from one watershed and the diversion of it into another. In my note of July 26, 1926, I informed the British ambassador that this Government was not prepared to admit the conclusions of law stated in his notes of February 5, 1926, and May 1, 1926, on this question. I did not think it was advisable to enter into a discussion of this legal question in view of the fact that the issues involved in certain cases which were then and are still pending in the Supreme Court of the United States are closely parallel to the questions presented in the ambassador's notes. For this same reason I do not now desire to enter into a discussion of this question at the present moment.

This Government, however, has heretofore indicated that it is prepared to enter into discussions and negotiations with Canada covering the whole question of preservation of lake levels in the mutual interest of the two countries.

This Government is glad to note the agreement by the Government of Canada with the conclusions of the Joint Board of Engineers that the diversion at Chicago has affected lake levels less than 6 inches. It also notes the feeling on the part of the Canadian Government that lake levels could be dealt with, so far as navigation is concerned, by compensating works as recommended by the Joint Board of Engineers. It would appear in this connection that the question as to the practical results of diversion in its effect on navigation could be entirely remedied.

As to the observation by the Canadian Government that the installation of compensatory works to restore lake levels would not recoup to the Great Lakes system the power lost to the system by the diversion at Chicago, I would, without in any way admitting the principles of compensation, call attention to the fact that Canada now receives 36,000 second-feet at Niagara as against 20,000 cubic feet per second on the American side for power purposes. I would further observe that without development of the lower St. Lawrence this question does not arise in that connection.

I again wish to point out that all these problems appeal to the American Government as matters that may be settled by practical engineering measures which might be adopted pending further discussion of the principles involved.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

The Hon. VINCENT MASSEY,
Minister of the Dominion of Canada.

For your further information I am printing herewith my own correspondence with Mr. Kellogg on the subject:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 19, 1927.

MY DEAR MR. PEAVEY: I am in receipt of your letter of February 11, 1927, inquiring what steps, if any, have been taken by this department toward concluding a treaty or treaties with Canada looking to the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway.

You will recall that on December 19, 1921, the International Joint Commission, in its report on a reference made to it by the Governments of the United States and Canada, recommended, among other things, that the Governments of the United States and Canada enter into an arrangement by way of treaty for a scheme of improvement of the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake Ontario. On May 17, 1922, this Government suggested to Canada that a treaty be negotiated framed on the basis of the report of the commission, or such modifications thereof as might be agreed upon. In its reply to this suggestion, made on January 30, 1924, the Canadian Government indicated that it preferred that before the negotiation of a treaty a further report be made covering the engineering features of the whole project, including its cost. At the same time the Canadian Government indicated that it was its intention to form an advisory committee to inquire fully from a national standpoint into the other questions involved.

In accordance with the desires of the Canadian Government a joint engineering board was appointed and instructed to make a further study of the engineering features of the project. An advisory commission was also appointed by the President with the Hon. Herbert Hoover as chairman, to examine into the matter from the standpoint of the national interests of the United States.

As you are aware, the reports of the joint board of engineers and the St. Lawrence Commission of the United States have recently been made. The reports are being given consideration by the interested branches of this Government, but as yet no negotiations based upon them have been instituted.

I am, my dear Mr. PEAVEY, very sincerely yours,

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

[Western Union]

WASHBURN, WIS., May 2, 1927.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.:

Please advise what steps, if any, have been taken by State Department toward negotiating treaties with Canada for construction of St. Lawrence deep waterway. Will you wire answer by night letter?

H. H. PEAVEY,
Member of Congress.

[Western Union]

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 3, 1927.

Hon. H. H. PEAVEY,
Washburn, Wis.:

Your telegram, May 2, regarding St. Lawrence deep waterway. I have recently taken up this subject with the Canadian Government, and am awaiting an expression of the views of that Government pending an understanding with the Government of Canada. In respect to the publication of my note I am giving out no information as to its contents.

FRANK B. KELLOGG.
Secretary of State.

WASHBURN, WIS., October 1, 1927.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Many inquiries have come to me respecting the status of the negotiations between the United States and Canada upon the subject of the proposed St. Lawrence deep waterway.

Will you please advise what progress has been made toward the consummation of such treaties?

Thanking you in advance, I am,

Very respectfully yours,

H. H. PEAVEY.

FEBRUARY 21, 1928.

The Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
The Secretary of State of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Permit me to thank you for your courtesy in informing me with relation to the status of the present negotiations between yourself and the Government of Canada with regard to the securing of a treaty or agreement under which it will be possible to build the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway. I sincerely hope your optimism in this matter will be borne out by future developments. In the name of the people of the district I represent, as well as those of the entire Northwest, permit me to wish you complete and immediate success in your undertaking.

In accordance with our conversation by telephone last Thursday, I am submitting herewith a tentative draft of a resolution which I contemplate introducing in Congress in the near future. I shall be glad to get your reactions or suggestions with regard to this proposal.

The people of the mid-continent have been deprived of their rights in the matter of water-borne commerce. The failure to make physical connection between the railroads and the boat lines has driven practically all general trade ships off the Great Lakes. It has isolated the people of the Northwest, making them wholly dependent on the railroads for transportation. This padlocking of the harbors of the Great Lakes has removed every vestige of competitive railroad rates. We believe the building of the St. Lawrence waterway will to a large extent restore general commerce on the Lakes, and this appears to us as a natural heritage.

The movement for the development of the St. Lawrence waterway is not new. It has been before our people for the past 60 years. Since the creation of the joint commission by Congress in 1909 public officials and other agencies have repeatedly assured the people that the canal would be built in the near future. You will therefore understand, Mr. Secretary, the reluctance on the part of the people of the Northwest to accept further promises on a matter of such national importance, which they feel has been already too long delayed.

The 40,000,000 inhabitants of the area tributary to the Great Lakes are demanding action by Congress, the administration, and yourself, to the end that some definite action may be taken looking to the actual building of this waterway. It would seem important, therefore, that Congress, by the reassertion of its policy with reference to the building of this waterway, would satisfy this demand and to that extent aid you in carrying on your negotiations with Canada. I am proposing this resolution and writing this letter as a matter of duty that this appeal from the people of my district and the whole Northwest may be conveyed directly to you.

I wish to assure you, Mr. Secretary, that it is not my purpose or intention to embarrass or in any way hinder you in conducting these negotiations with Canada. On the contrary, I have every desire to aid and encourage and to wish you early and complete success.

Very respectfully yours,

H. H. PEAVEY.

APRIL 27, 1928.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
Secretary of State of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In consideration of the recent publication of the official correspondence exchanged by the State Department of the United States and the Canadian Government on the subject of the treaty negotiations leading to the construction and development of the St. Lawrence waterway, it occurs to me that you might now wish to answer my communication of February 21, at which time I submitted to you a tentative draft of a resolution in support of the waterway, the introduction of which I withheld at your suggestion.

Also, considering the further press releases from the State Department, it would appear that the Canadian Government has altered its position relative to the diversion of water from the Great Lakes by the Chicago Sanitary District since our conference held some time ago, when you assured me that, in your opinion, the Canadian Government was willing to accept the principle of compensatory works at Chicago. It now occurs to me that it might be advisable to introduce a bill or resolution providing in substance the theory or principle laid down by the United States Board of Engineers in regard to the water diversion at Chicago, namely, a fixed graduated reduction in the amount of diversion down to one or two thousand second-feet, the minimum amount necessary for sanitation and navigation in the Chicago and Des Plaines Rivers.

The extraction of this tremendous amount of water from the Great Lakes at this time is deeply resented by the people of Wisconsin as well as those of the entire Northwest, and the refusal of Canada to countenance this action by the Chicago Sanitary District is not at all surprising to me, and I therefore feel that only through action by Congress limiting the diversion of water can it be expected that Canada will fully concur on all phases of the waterway subject.

I can assure you of the individual interest of the people of my district and the entire Northwest in the matter and express to you their most earnest hope that treaties satisfactory to both the United States and Canada will be consummated at an early date.

Very truly yours,

H. H. PEAVEY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 2, 1928.

MY DEAR MR. PEAVEY: I have pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of your letter of April 27, 1928, in which you referred to your letter of February 21, 1928, inclosing copy of a proposed resolution, declaring the report submitted by the United States-St. Lawrence Commission on December 27, 1926, on the development of a waterway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean by way of the St. Lawrence River to be the policy of Congress.

I have no suggestions or objections to offer in regard to the resolution which you propose to introduce. I assure you, however, that the matter of the St. Lawrence waterway has received and will continue to receive the energetic attention of the department and of other officials of the Government concerned in the project, and all proper action will be taken to bring the negotiations to an early conclusion. The correspondence published on April 14, 1928, reveals the present status of the negotiations.

I am, my dear Mr. Peavey,

Very sincerely yours, FRANK B. KELLOGG.

Inserted below is a recent letter by myself to the St. Lawrence Tidewater Association and their reply:

MAY 1, 1928.

Mr. CHARLES P. CRAIG,
Executive Director, St. Lawrence Tidewater Association,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CRAIG: I have your letter of April 13 and note that you are working out a program of political action with the purpose of securing the adoption of "a Great Lakes to the ocean via the St. Lawrence waterway" plank by the Republican and Democratic National Parties at the June conventions.

About a year ago the President of your association, Ex-Governor Harding, of Iowa, appeared before the Ashland Public Forum and made a speech in support of the St. Lawrence waterway. Taking advantage of the rules of the Ashland Public Forum, I asked Mr. Harding some questions. Among others, I asked him the following: "The St. Lawrence Tidewater Association has publicly stated that 24 Northwestern States are pledged to the immediate building of the St. Lawrence deep waterway and that President Coolidge and Secretaries Kellogg and Hoover are favorable to the project. Why has the association failed to induce the Republican Party to go on record in favor of the St. Lawrence waterway or adopt a plank to that effect in their national conventions?" Governor Harding answered as follows: "I am president of this association not as a Democrat, Republican, or Socialist, but as an American citizen. We are not trying to play politics with the waterway. We work with all parties."

I am glad to see that your association has aroused itself to the necessity of putting the national political parties on record as a means of providing support for the waterway before Congress and the people of the United States. I am sure the people of the Northwest will join me in wishing you complete success in getting such a plank adopted at both the Republican and Democratic conventions.

Replying directly to your letter of the 13th with relation to the attitude of the Republican delegates from the State of Wisconsin on this subject, I wish to state that I had the honor of serving as a member of the advisory committee of 11 that formulated the platform on which our Progressive Republican delegates were elected to the national convention, and included in our recommendations, which were later adopted as our platform, is a St. Lawrence waterway plank, as follows: "No. 10. We favor a deep waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea. The Government should, in conjunction with Canada, take immediate action to give the Northwestern States an outlet to the ocean for cargoes without change in bulk, thus making the primary markets on the Great Lakes equal to those of New York."

In this connection I can say to you, Mr. Craig, that I sought the adoption of an even stronger and more comprehensive plank on this subject than the one stated above. In my recommendations to the committee I included the proposition of the disappearance of general commerce from the Great Lakes and how the great natural advantage which belongs to the people living tributary to the Great Lakes, that of cheap transportation by water, is being denied them, largely due to the influence of railroad owners in New York, and that this enforced isolation of the Northwestern States was costing the people of that territory hundreds of millions of dollars annually, etc.

The Republican delegates to the Kansas City convention from Wisconsin are divided as follows: There are 17 Progressive Republicans pledged to the plank quoted above, who, I know, you can depend upon to vote and work for the adoption by the convention of an indorsement of the St. Lawrence waterway. Of the remaining 9 members of the delegation, 2 of these were elected to support Mr. Hoover, who was represented as a champion of the waterway. Two of the remaining 7 were elected and pledged to the nomination of ex-Governor Lowden, of Illinois, without any reference being made to the waterway. The remaining 5 regular Republicans were elected as uninstructed and without any reference or pledge as to the waterway. I trust this information will be of some help to you in securing the adoption of a strong St. Lawrence waterway-development plank at the Republican National Convention in Kansas City this coming June.

Yours very truly,

H. H. PEAVEY.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE TIDEWATER ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1928.

Hon. H. H. PEAVEY,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PEAVEY: Thank you for your letter of first instant.

The information you convey is explicit and valuable.

Speaking of efforts to have the Republican Party go on record in favor of the St. Lawrence waterway, I wish to say that at the last Republican convention in Cleveland in 1924 a plank was drafted, approved by President Coolidge, and sent to Cleveland with his personal approval. It went before the resolutions committee with the understanding that it would be put through, but two Congressmen from New York—Dempsey and Sweet—appeared before the committee and were able to have the committee change the resolution so that it meant nothing of great value. We did get a declaration—not a strong one—in the Democratic platform in 1924.

I note the clause No. 10 in the platform of the Progressive Republican Party of Wisconsin. That is fine, and, as you know, I am in sympathy with your position with respect to the present restricted use of the Great Lakes.

I am surprised that the delegates pledged to support Governor Lowden would not have placed the St. Lawrence in their platform because Governor Lowden has always been a supporter of the seaway.

The information is all valuable and may be utilized to very great advantage.

With kind personal regards, I remain

Yours sincerely,

CHAS. P. CRAIG, Executive Director.

In the light of these facts who will maintain that we are any nearer to success and winning the St. Lawrence waterway now than in 1909. Nineteen wasted years.

It is a self-evident deduction from the facts stated above that northwest railroad owners, who live in New York, gauged always by hindsight rather than foresight, stand to lose $125,000,000 a year if the waterway is built, and they are bringing every possible political and financial influence to bear on the Government at Washington to prevent it.

The future development and prosperity of Superior, Duluth, Ashland, Washburn, Bayfield, and the other lake cities of the Northwest are being sacrificed because railroad owners are afraid to compete with water-borne commerce. The progress of 40,000,000 people is being thwarted to protect a transportation monopoly.

Since the above was prepared advance press notice has carried the news that Canada has replied to Secretary Mellon's last note of April 7, 1928, stating in substance that they would not negotiate until the illegal diversion of water at Chicago was stopped or the principle disavowed by the United States. This correspondence has not been given to the press.

Twenty-one States and 40,000,000 people are demanding this waterway. No one has had the temerity to appear in public opposition but a few individual politicians and power representatives from New York. Do you not think it is about time to separate those who really want the waterway built from those who just talk about it for political reasons?

The building of the St. Lawrence canal from an engineering standpoint is mere child's play compared with our undertaking in building the Panama Canal. Under President Roosevelt it took only two years to survey and seven years to build this great engineering enterprise. The Government agencies in charge of the St. Lawrence waterway in Washington have spent over a million dollars and 19 years to prepare a 60-page pamphlet report.

Can you, Mr. Wisconsin business man and farmer, content yourself to sit idle in the face of these facts and with the divine patience of Job assuage yourself by saying, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

COLORADO RIVER BASIN

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill to improve the Colorado River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that early consideration will be given by the House to the legislation providing for the protection and development of the Colorado River Basin, as provided in H. R. 5773, introduced by Mr. SWING, of California, I gladly avail myself, as chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, of this opportunity to make available to the Members of the House certain facts concerning the importance and urgency of enacting into law this meritorious measure.

I doubt if any project ever brought before Congress has been more thoroughly considered over a long period of time, or one which, when completed, will have more lasting and beneficial effects upon a large proportion of the people of the United States.

There certainly has been no more important measure before this House that has had the support of the Chief Executive and high officials of our Government than the pending legislation.

The President in his message to the Congress of December 6, 1927, stated:

> Legislation is desirable for the construction of a dam at Boulder Canyon on the Colorado River, primarily as a method of flood control and irrigation. A secondary result would be a considerable power development and a source of domestic water supply for southern California.

In his message to the Congress of December 22, 1926, he declared:

> In previous messages, I have referred to the national importance of the proper development of our water resources. The great project of extension of the Mississippi system, the protection and development of the lower Colorado River, are before Congress, and I have previously commented upon them. I favor the necessary legislation to expedite these projects.

On March 17, 1924, the present Secretary of the Interior, Dr. Hubert Work, in reporting to this committee on legislation similar to the pending bill, said:

> The Colorado River has been under observation, survey, and study, and the subject of reports to Congress since the close of the Civil War. More than $350,000 have been expended by the Bureau of Reclamation since the Kinkaid Act of May 18, 1920. More than $2,000,000 have been expended by other agencies of the Government. The time has arrived when the Government should decide whether it will proceed to convert this natural menace into a national resource. (Hearings on H. R. 2903, 68th Cong., 1st sess., p. 818.)

There is attached hereto his report on the proposed legislation dated January 18, 1926, setting forth in detail his views on the provisions of the bill.

In his latest report of January 4, 1928, printed herewith in the RECORD, he states:

The general plan and purpose of this measure have my support, and I favor its being made a national undertaking, to be carried out and administered by the Federal Government.

* * * For the reasons stated, I recommend the favorable consideration of the bill.

The paramount purpose of this legislation is the protection of human life and property in Imperial Valley, Calif., which are under a constant menace of destruction from the floods of a rebellious and treacherous river. Other valleys in the lower Colorado also greatly need protection from its high-water flow, including Yuma and Parker in Arizona and Palo Verde and Needles in California. All these have suffered from the floods of the Colorado. All are concerned with Imperial Valley in the solution of its mighty problem. This bill presents a project which will afford such solution.

The great constructive development proposed by this legislation not only will end the river's menace but will also put its wasting waters to work in the interest of society, creating new homes, building up new industries, adding to the wealth of the Nation and the well-being of a considerable portion of its people.

This legislation and the project it authorizes have received the most careful study and earnest consideration by the committee for the last four Congresses, and volumes of testimony have been compiled. During this Congress the committee has devoted much time to the hearing of testimony respecting the project and to the consideration of the provisions of the legislation authorizing it. The committee has had before it the report of the hearings held during the Sixty-seventh, Sixty-eighth, and Sixty-ninth Congresses, comprising thousands of pages of testimony, as well as extensive and detailed reports by Federal agencies charged with the duty of studying the Colorado River.

The committee also had the benefit of the recent reports of Hon. James R. Garfield, former Secretary of the Interior; Hon. Frank C. Emerson, Governor of Wyoming; Dr. William F. Durand, of Stanford University; and Hon. James G. Scrugham, former Governor of Nevada, who acted as special advisers to the Secretary of the Interior at his request, and which have been printed as part 4 of the hearings. Many members of the committee have inspected the site of the great dam which the bill authorizes, the section of Mexico through which the canal passes, the Imperial Valley, which is the region most menaced by the river's flood waters, as well as other sections of the Southwest which will be directly affected by the development. It may be said with perfect accuracy that no project of internal improvement has ever come before Congress backed by such extended and exhaustive consideration as has been accorded to this one.

Not alone does this bill, as expressed in its title, authorize works "for the protection and development of the lower Colorado River Basin," but it represents a vitally important step in the plan to protect and safeguard the interest of States and communities far removed from the works to be built, thus permitting these States and communities to look to the future with the assurance which established water rights give to regions dependent upon irrigation for their agricultural existence.

While the works here authorized are of great magnitude, a financial plan has been worked out with the assistance of the Secretary of the Treasury and incorporated in the bill, under which their cost will not burden the Federal Treasury nor weigh upon the general taxpayer. The financial burden of the development is placed upon its immediate beneficiaries. Thus section 4 (b) of the bill provides:

(b) Before any money is appropriated, or any construction work done or contracted for, the Secretary of the Interior shall make provision for revenues, by contract or otherwise, in accordance with the provisions of this act, adequate, in his judgment, to insure payment of all expenses of operation and maintenance of said works incurred by the United States and the repayment, within 50 years from the date of the completion of the project, of all amounts advanced to the fund under subdivision (b) of section 2, together with interest thereon.

The moneys advanced to the fund, referred to, embrace not only money actually appropriated to cover the cost of the work but interest on the same during the period of construction.

The project falls naturally into nine divisions or parts, as follows:

Part I. The Colorado River and its characteristics, and the Imperial Valley.
Part II. The Boulder Canyon project, its development and plan.
Part III. The Colorado River compact, the upper and lower basins.
Part IV. Flood control.
Part V. All-American canal.
Part VI. Domestic water.
Part VII. Power.
Part VIII. Authority of the Government.
Part IX. Form of bill.

PART I.—THE COLORADO RIVER AND ITS CHARACTERISTICS, AND THE IMPERIAL VALLEY

To grasp the urgent need of this project calls for a brief statement of the characteristics of the Colorado River, as well as of the Imperial Valley in California.

The Colorado is one of the great rivers of the United States. Rising in the high mountains of Colorado and Wyoming, it flows through these States and the States of Utah, Arizona, Nevada, and California. It forms part of the boundary between Arizona and Nevada and between Arizona and California. After crossing the boundary line between the United States and Mexico it flows some 50 miles through the latter country and discharges into the head of the Gulf of California.

Actual measurements, taken over a period of 25 years, show an average annual discharge of water by the river of approximately 17,000,000 acre-feet. The river varies greatly in flow, both annual and seasonal. One year the discharge may be as great as 25,000,000 acre-feet; another year it may be as low as 9,000,000 acre-feet. Even more striking is the seasonal variation. In flood, the discharge at times is more than 200,000 cubic feet per second. In August, September, and October the river is at low flow. Frequently this flow is as low as 2,500 cubic feet per second; on September 11, 1924, it was less than 1,300 cubic feet per second.

The rim of the upper drainage basin of the river is composed largely of high mountain ranges. Melting snows from these ranges and the rainfall increase its volume. The lower portion of the basin is composed of hot, arid plains of low altitude, broken by short mountain groups. The central portion consists of a high plateau, through which the river runs for hundreds of miles in a deep and narrow canyon.

As the river flows from the plateau region it picks up tremendous quantities of silt, which is carried into the lower reaches of the river, the annual discharge below Yuma being over 100,000 acre-feet, or more than 161,000,000 cubic yards, an amount equal in volume to the total excavations made by the United States in constructing the Panama Canal.

Imperial Valley lies in the southeasterly portion of California. On the south it is bounded by the Mexican line; its easterly edge is about 40 miles west of the Colorado River. On the American side of the line it is separated from the river by a range of low sand hills, which lie between the river channel and the valley floor. Centuries ago the Imperial Valley was the northerly end of the Gulf of California. The tremendous quantities of silt carried by the river gradually built a great delta across the gulf, completely separating the northern from the southern end of the gulf. Evaporation unwatered the region thus cut off and left Imperial Valley. Thus Imperial Valley lies like a great saucer with the Colorado running along its rim from 100 to 300 feet above the valley's floor.

This valley secures its sole water supply from the Colorado River through a canal starting from the river just above the international boundary, and thence running for many miles through Mexico before reentering the United States.

Imperial Valley has a population of 65,000 people, six well-built, incorporated cities, besides several unincorporated towns, over 400,000 acres of cultivated farms, and property values of over $100,000,000.

As irrigation uses have increased up the river, and particularly as irrigation has increased in Mexico, the water available for irrigation in the valley during the period of low flow of the river has grown less and less.

Imperial and Coachella Valleys, during May, June, and July of each year, are threatened by destruction by flood. In September and October Imperial Valley is threatened by, and has actually suffered, millions of dollars of loss from drought, and the same is also true, only in a lesser degree, of Yuma, Parker, and Mojave Valleys in Arizona and Palo Verde Valley in California.

PART II. THE BOULDER CANYON PROJECT—ITS DEVELOPMENT AND PLAN

THE PROJECT

The works authorized are—

First. A dam 550 feet in height at Boulder or Black Canyon, where the river forms the boundary between Arizona and Nevada. Not only do these canyons furnish a wonderful natural dam site, but here is an equally wonderful natural reservoir site, where there will be impounded 26,000,000 acre-feet of water. The estimated cost of the dam is $41,500,000, or but $1.62 per acre-foot of storage.

Second. Power plants to utilize the water power created at the dam. (The construction of plants is left optional with the Secretary. He may instead lease the water power.) Five hundred and fifty thousand firm or constant horsepower will be available, or 1,000,000 horsepower on a 55 per cent load factor. The estimated cost of installing plants of 1,000,000-horsepower capacity is $31,500,000, or $31.50 per installed horsepower, while the cost per installed horsepower of both dam and plants is but $73.

Third. An all-American canal from the river to the Imperial Valley and Coachella Valley. The estimated cost of the canal is $31,000,000.

Interest during construction on the cost of these works is estimated at $21,000,000, which added to their cost makes $125,000,000, the amount of the authorized appropriation. The item of interest during construction does not, of course, represent an actual appropriation, and should the Secretary elect not to build power plants the cost of construction of the works would be reduced to $72,500,000, with a corresponding reduction of the interest item during construction.

PURPOSES OF THE PROJECT

This project, fortunately, will accomplish a number of important purposes.

First. It will end the ever-increasing flood menace of the lower river, which threatens the destruction of large and important communities lying under the level of its channel. The great reservoir will catch and hold the flood waters until they can be released at a rate which the river channel can accommodate with safety. The water so stored will guarantee the lower-basin communities, especially Imperial Valley, a dependable water supply, and by thus making use of the flood waters in the lower basin the upper reaches of the river will furnish abundant water for use in the upper basin without encroaching upon prior appropriations below.

Second. It will end an intolerable situation which now exists in Imperial Valley. This valley now secures its sole water supply by a canal which runs for some 60 miles through Mexico. The all-American canal will furnish a substitute for this and at the same time carry the water at an elevation sufficient to make possible, at some future date, the irrigation of additional land, mostly public, lying about the rim of the cultivated area.

Third. Flood waters conserved at the dam and reservoir, besides providing for irrigation needs below, will provide for a much needed domestic water supply for cities on the Pacific coast.

Fourth. The dam and reservoir will incidentally create a large amount of hydroelectric power from the disposal of which the project will be in large part financed.

Fifth. The dam will improve navigation, safeguard interstate commerce, and protect Government property. Under the operation of the project the flow of the river below the dam will be regulated and even. With its flow unregulated the river can not be successfully used as a highway for commerce. In its regulated form it will be susceptible to use by power boats and other small craft. The great reservoir will, of course, be susceptible of navigation.

Sixth. Certain international complications now existing will be largely solved through the construction of this project. These will be referred to in Part V of this report.

LOCATION FOR DAM

The overwhelming weight of opinion favors the Boulder or Black Canyon site. These two sites are close together and are frequently termed the upper and lower Boulder Canyon sites. A dam at either site will store the water in practically the same reservoir basin, virtually all of which is desert land of no value except for reservoir purposes. Natural conditions at this point are extremely favorable for the construction of a great dam at minimum of cost. An immense natural reservoir site is here available. A development at this point will fully and adequately serve all purposes—flood control, storage of irrigation and domestic water, improvement of navigation, and power. It is the nearest available site to the power market, an important element from a business or financial standpoint.

As stated by Secretary Hoover:

I believe the largest group of those who have dealt with the problem, both engineers and business folk, have come to the conclusion that there should be a high dam erected somewhere in the vicinity of Black Canyon. That is known usually as the Boulder Canyon site, but nevertheless it is actually Black Canyon. The dam so erected is proposed to serve the triple purpose of power, flood control, and storage. Perhaps I should state them in a different order—flood control, storage, and power, as power is a by-product of these other works.

There are theoretical engineering reasons why flood control and storage work should be erected farther up the river and why storage works should be erected farther down the river, and I have not any doubt but that given another century of development on the river all these things will be done. The problem that we have to consider, however, is that which will serve the next generation in the most economical manner, and we must take capital expenditure and power markets into consideration in determining this. I can conceive the development of probably 15 different dams on the Colorado River, the securing of 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 horsepower; but the only place where there is an economic market for power to-day, at least of any consequence, is in southern California, the economical distance for the most of such dams being too remote for that market. No doubt markets will grow in time so as to warrant the construction of dams all up and down the river. We have to consider here the problem of financing; that in the erection of a dam, or of any works for that matter, we must make such recovery as we can on the cost, and therefore we must find an immediate market for power. For that reason it seems to be that logic drives us as near to the lower market as possible, and that it therefore takes us down into the lower canyon. (Hearings on S. Res. 320, 68th Cong., 2d sess., p. 601.)

Mr. Garfield, one of the special advisers, in his report to the Secretary of the Interior, stated as follows:

I am satisfied that the most favorable site for first construction is at Boulder Canyon. At that point the opportunity is afforded to construct a dam which would impound approximately 26,000,000 acre-feet of water, thus assuring, as far as it is humanly possible to assure, the storage of floods and permit a flow in the river below at such times and in such quantities as would provide for future irrigation and prevent the disasters which have been and will be attendant upon unregulated floods.

The recent report of Governor Scrugham to the Secretary of the Interior also said:

Upper Boulder Canyon and lower Boulder Canyon or Black Canyon: These two sites, on account of their adjacent location and market superiority to all other locations, are best considered together.

1. Both sites are topographically well adapted for the construction of a high and large impounding reservoir.

2. The rock formation at the upper Boulder site is granite. At the lower Boulder or Black site is a highly silicified adesitic tuff which is more monolithic in character.

3. For the same height of dam above low water, the Black Canyon site will give somewhat larger reservoir and storage capacity. For the same elevation of economic high-water level the advantage is very much in favor of the Black Canyon site.

4. This lower site also has available large deposits of suitable gravel and other necessary construction materials which will reduce construction costs.

5. The Black Canyon site is readily accessible by rail and wagon road. The upper Boulder, Bridge, Diamond, and Glen Canyon sites are all very difficult of access.

6. The Black Canyon site has more suitable bedrock for dam foundations at distinctly less depth than other sites examined. The canyon walls are closer together and there are more favorable locations for the proposed power house and construction camps. All of these items will tend to reduce construction costs.

7. The Black Canyon site is closer to the territory to be served by the reservoir than any of the previously mentioned sites thus reducing costs and losses of transmission.

A disadvantage which has been urged against both the upper and lower Boulder Canyon locations is the existence of extensive salt deposits within the reservoir area. The matter has been made the subject of most careful examination by the writer and a number of geologists, notably Dr. F. L. Ransome. The salt outcrops are generally in bluffs covered with heavy insoluble overburden. The total quantity is impossible to estimate, but the amount which would go into solution in the reservoir water is so negligible that it would not noticeably affect its salinity. The action of the water on the salt would be to undermine the insoluble overburden and cause it to settle on the exposed salt faces. This action, together with an additional covering of silt deposited from the reservoir water can be depended upon to minimize the dissolving action. For all practical purposes the dilution of the salt will be so great as to render it harmless.

The statement of Governor Emerson in his report as special adviser on this subject is as follows:

A reservoir of 26,000,000 acre-feet capacity, created by the construction of a comparatively high dam at Black Canyon on the Colorado River some 40 miles distant from Las Vegas, Nev., would afford satisfactory solution of the problems set forth in paragraph 3 herein and would also meet the requirements specified by paragraph 4 herein. In addition such a reservoir project would make practical the development of a large amount of hydroelectric power as well as provide for the extension of present irrigated areas and for additional valuable uses of water for domestic, municipal, industrial, and other purposes.

* * * * * * *

The most feasible site for a high dam upon the Colorado River to solve the major problems now existent upon the lower river is situated at Black Canyon some 40 miles from Las Vegas, Nev.

The reservoir project described in paragraph 5, and commonly known as the Boulder Canyon project, would constitute a great constructive undertaking and appears to afford the best solution of the entire situation applying to the lower Colorado River.

UNITED STATES THE PROPER AGENCY TO UNDERTAKE DEVELOPMENT

Because the Colorado River is an interstate and international stream, and because of the various conflicting uses of water, such as for flood control, irrigation, regulation for commerce, domestic water, and power generation, the Government is the proper and logical agency to undertake this development. It is well equipped for this purpose. The Reclamation Service has had wide experience in large dam construction. This idea was well expressed by the Secretary of the Interior in his report of January 12, 1926, on the project, where he said:

Interstate and international rights and interests involved, the diversified benefits from the construction of these works, the waiting necessities of cities for increased water supplies, the large development of latent agricultural resources, the protection of those already developed, and the immense industrial benefits which may come from the production of cheap power, which together appear to render the construction and subsequent control of these works a measure of such economic and social importance that no agency but the Federal Government should be intrusted with the protection of rights or distribution of its opportunities. All uses can be coordinated and the fullest benefits realized only by their centralized control.

A similar view was voiced by the President in a telegram to C. C. Teague, of date October 7, 1924, in which he said:

The major purposes of the works to be constructed * * * involve two fundamental questions which must always remain in public control—that is, flood control and the provision of immense water storage necessary to hold the seasonal and annual flow so as to provide for the large reclamation possibilities in both California and Arizona. These considerations seem to me to dominate all others and to point logically to the Federal Government as the agency to undertake the construction of a great dam at Boulder Canyon or some other suitable location. * * * I should, indeed, look with great pride on the consummation of this, one of our greatest national improvements within my administration. (Hearings on S. 727, 68th Cong., 2d sess, p. 13.)

This thought was also clearly expressed by the late President Harding in the same manuscript of an address which he expected to deliver at San Diego. He was prevented from delivering this address by death. He said:

"Such a gigantic operation may not be accomplished within the resources of the local communities. It is my view, and I believe the accepted view of a large part of our people, that the initial capital for the installation of these engineering works must be provided by the American people as a whole, and truly the American people as a whole benefit from such investment. The addition to our national assets of so productive a unit benefits not alone the local community created by it but also, directly and indirectly, our entire national life.

"I should, indeed, be proud if during my administration I could participate in the inauguration of this great project by affixing my signature to the proper legislation by Congress through which it might be launched. I should feel that I had some small part in the many thousands of fine American homes that would spring forth from the desert during the course of my lifetime as the result of such an act, and in the extension of these fine foundations of our American people." (Hearings, H. R. 2903, 68th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 1884, 1885.)

The views of the advisory committee to the Secretary of the Interior on this subject are as follows:

Mr. GARFIELD. The jurisdiction of a single State is not broad enough to deal with all the problems that necessarily arise in the construction and development of such a project as that under consideration. The United States alone has the power properly to safeguard the interest and rights of all those who may be affected by such a major development, and is, furthermore, the only political agency that can deal with and settle the international questions arising with Mexico.

The United States is not only the political sovereign whose jurisdiction is broad enough to deal with all the phases of the problem, but it is likewise the largest landowner along the bed of the Colorado. Hence whatever theory of the use of water is adopted in any particular State, the use of the public domain in that State can only be obtained under congressional act, and Congress may impose in such act whatever conditions it deems wise.

Governor EMERSON. The construction and operation of the described project is a logical and, in some phases, even a necessary undertaking of the Federal Government for the following reasons:

(a) The international situation applying to the river.
(b) Flood control as a national problem.
(c) Reclamation of land as an accepted Government activity.
(d) Magnitude of project and of various interests involved.

Governor SCRUGHAM. With all of the above factors in mind, it appears entirely proper and practicable for the Federal Government to undertake the first step in river development, which is the construction of an adequate dam and reservoir for flood and silt control, reimbursing itself for the costs from sales of stored water and the large quantities of power which can be incidentally generated. Future developments of the river by private or municipal enterprise will suffer no interference therefrom.

HOW THE PROJECT TOOK FORM

After many requests by the communities in the lower Colorado River Basin for relief, Congress on May 18, 1920, passed the so-called Kinkaid Act, directing the Secretary of the Interior to make an investigation of the problems of the lower Colorado and report back to Congress his recommendations as to the proper plan of development. An initial appropriation of $20,000 was made. As investigations proceeded this was supplemented by contributions from the Imperial irrigation district; Coachella Valley; Palo Verde Valley, Ariz.; Los Angeles; Pasadena; and other interested communities, aggregating $171,000, which, with subsequent appropriations by Congress, made a total of approximately $400,000.

A preliminary report was completed in the early part of 1921, public hearings on this were had by the Secretary of the Interior, and on February 28, 1922, his final report, recommending in substance the project here authorized, was transmitted to Congress. The report is published as Senate Document No. 142, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session.

Bills were introduced in both Houses to carry out the recommendations of the report, and hearings were had.

Passage of legislation (the forerunner of the present bill) was recommended by the Interior Department in a communication to the House Committee on Irrigation on June 14, 1922. (Hearings on H. R. 11449, 67th Cong., 2d sess., p. 4.)

It was again urged by the department in a communication to the House committee on March 17, 1924. (Hearings on H. R. 2903, 68th Cong., 1st sess., p. 818.)

The project was favorably reported on by engineers of the Reclamation Service in February, 1924, in a voluminous report which has been before this committee and considered by it, but which has not been published. This report contains a wealth of technical data on irrigable areas, various plans of development of the river, cost estimates, and similar data.

On January 12, 1926, the Interior Department again recommended the project in a report to which reference is herein frequently made. (Hearings on S. Res. 320, 69th Cong., 1st sess., p. 867.)

On December 6 last the President again gave his approval of the project, and on January 4, 1928, the Secretary of the Interior, in his report to this committee, approved the bill under consideration and recommended the development.

The financial plan contained in the bill was prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury. (Report to House committee.)

This summary, by no means complete, of the various reports and recommendation upon this project indicates the great care and long study which it has received from various Government departments and agencies and from congressional committees. It is a result of all these that the project has taken its present form.

PLAN OF FINANCING

The Secretary of the Interior in his report of January 12, 1926, gives his estimate of the financial working of the project, as follows:

Capital investment

Estimated cost for—
26,000,000 acre-feet reservoir	$41,500,000
1,000,000-horsepower development	31,500,000
The all-American canal	31,000,000
Interest during construction on above, 5 years at 4 per cent	21,000,000
Total	125,000,000

Annual operation

Estimated gross revenues from—
Sale 3,600,000,000 kilowatt-hours power at three-tenths cent	10,800,000
Storage and delivery of water for irrigation and domestic purposes	1,500,000
Total	12,300,000
Estimated fixed annual charges for—
Operation and maintenance, storage, and power	700,000
Operation and maintenance, all-American canal	500,000
Interest on $125,000,000 at 4 per cent	5,000,000
Total	6,200,000
Estimated annual surplus thought to be sufficient to repay the entire cost in 25 years	6,100,000

ESTIMATES ARE CAREFULLY MADE

The cost estimates given by the Secretary of the Interior are the result of long and painstaking studies of that department. Mr. F. E. Weymouth, then chief engineer of the Reclamation Service, under whose personal supervision the major part of the studies were made, testified before the House committee as follows:

We have on our consulting staff Mr. A. J. Wiley and Mr. Louis Hill, and we have consulted them regularly in reference to this whole problem. We have had several engineering board meetings to consider the various phases of the problem, especially in reference to types of dams and methods of construction and cost of all that sort of thing. They were outside of our regular engineering force.

Asked about the engineers in his organization, he stated:

Mr. Walker Young, who is present to-day, has had charge of the investigations in Boulder Canyon for about three and a half years. Mr. Young had more to do than anybody else in the actual working out of the detailed designs and estimates, but he at all times had the advice of our chief designing engineer, Mr. J. L. Savage, whose headquarters are now in Denver, and also of the whole designing force of that office.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Savage has under his charge about 25 or 30 engineers of all kinds. In addition to that, we have had the assistance of Mr. Gaylord, who was until very recently our chief electrical engineer, and his assistants, and Mr. Dibble and his assistants. In the study of the water supply, the irrigable areas, and the control of the river for flood or for power purposes Mr. Debbler, who is here to-day, has made most of those studies.

* * * * * * *

We had Mr. Ransome, a geologist of the Geological Survey, make a very exhaustive geologic examination and report on the Boulder Canyon reservoir and dam site, and Mr. Jenison, of the Geological Survey, also assisted him. The Bureau of Standards has done a lot of work for the service in testing materials for construction. There is another man that I forgot to mention, a very valuable engineer and geologist, Mr. Homer Hamlin. The most work that has been done, perhaps, was done by Mr. Arthur P. Davis while he was the director of the service. Mr. James Munn, who was formerly a contractor and is, perhaps, one of the best construction men in the country—we have had his advice, especially in reference to unit costs that we have used in the estimates.

Concerning the advisory board, composed of Mr. Wiley and Mr. Hill, he said:

We have considered with them each step that we have taken as it came up and it has had their approval. (Hearings on H. R. 2903, 68th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 741–743.)

Governor Scrughum, in his report to the Secretary of the Interior, said:

In so far as engineering experience and human intelligence can be depended upon, the estimates are reliable.

Doctor Durand, in his report to the secretary, also stated:

The program of construction as proposed is the result of most careful study on the part of eminent and experienced engineers and has further had the benefit of serious and extended examinations and criticisms on the part of eminent engineers in civilian life. As the result of this examination and criticism it seems a fair conclusion that the plan as proposed embodies the elements best calculated to insure a successful program of construction, and that so far as human foresight and sound engineering judgment can provide the plan should carry through without serious modification or delay.

* * * * * * *

The general conclusion is therefore that there is ground for anticipating a construction cost of the canal at a somewhat lower figure than the $30,000,000 estimated in the report of 1919; or otherwise if the general estimate be still held at $30,000,000, it would imply a margin for contingencies or for unknown or unexpected conditions greater than would normally be allowed for any such piece of work.

GOVERNMENT FULLY ASSURED A RETURN OF ITS ADVANCES

Not only does the bill specifically require the complete prefinancing of the project, but the nature of the agencies which will underwrite the cost are such that there will never be any question of the prompt and businesslike meeting of all financial obligations. These agencies will be of established solvency. The Imperial irrigation district, an established going district, will be the largest contractor for irrigation water. Cities with an assessed valuation of over a billion dollars will contract for the storage of domestic water and for power to pump this water to an elevation of some 1,300 feet. Power, the great financial asset of the project, will be contracted for with such applicants as the States of Nevada and Arizona, private utilities like the Southern California Edison Co., and cities like Los Angeles, Pasadena, Glendale, and Riverside. Those agencies are announced applicants for power. Their contracts will be good.

Mr. Garfield, special adviser, reported to the Secretary of the Interior as follows:

I have examined the reports and estimates regarding the cost of power development and the probable revenue to be derived therefrom. I am satisfied that results of such construction would enable the Government to repay its entire expenditures over and above those allocated to the water users within a period of 40 to 50 years.

INDORSEMENT OF PROJECT

Besides numerous indorsements of State organizations and counties, cities, and other organizations of more or less local nature, including the Boulder Dam Association, an organization composed of some 200 public bodies in California, Nevada, and Arizona, it has been indorsed by the following national organizations: National Associations of Real Estate Boards, American Legion, National United Spanish War Veterans, American Federation of Labor, and the American Farm Bureau Federation. The latter organization reaffirmed its approval at its recent national convention.

PART III.—COLORADO RIVER COMPACT—APPORTIONMENT OF WATERS BETWEEN THE UPPER AND LOWER BASINS

In 1920 Congress, by the Kinkaid Act, directed an investigation of the lower Colorado River. This indicated the serious purpose of the Federal Government to proceed with the project for the protection and development of the lower basin. As works on the lower river would create permanent water rights, a movement was started by the States in the upper basin to secure by agreement, assurances from the lower-basin States that the upper States would forever have the right to the use of an equitable portion of the waters of the Colorado River, notwithstanding an earlier development and prior use of the water in the lower basin.

Commissioners were appointed by the seven States to negotiate an interstate treaty or compact. The Hon. Herbert Hoover was named to represent the Federal Government. Various conferences were held and finally on November 24, 1922, at Santa Fe, N. Mex., an agreement or compact was signed, dividing the waters of the river, not amongst the States but between the upper and lower basin States, the upper-basin States being Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, Wyoming, and the lower-basin States being Arizona, California, and Nevada.

Early in 1923 the legislatures of all of these States, except Arizona, ratified this compact. Arizona has thus far refused to ratify.

In 1925 a six-State ratification of the compact was suggested by States in the upper basin for the purpose of making the compact effective without Arizona. With Arizona out of the compact, however, it followed that California's approval on this new basis effectively made her the guarantor of the obligation of the whole lower basin. Under this plan any encroachment by Arizona upon the water allotted to the upper-basin States would have to be made up by California. With Arizona refusing to agree to any limitations upon her use of the water of the river, California was forced to take the position that she could not safely assume this new and additional obligation for the benefit of the upper States without assurance of large storage and that her assent to the compact should therefore become effective only upon this assurance of large storage by Congress.

With this storage there will be water for all, and upon its authorization by Congress California's ratification becomes effective upon a six-State basis. With assurances of storage, California has offered to ratify the compact unconditionally and waive the provision requiring approval by any specific number of States. Since California is the place where the upper-basin States fear the creation of new and enlarged water rights, her unconditional ratification of the compact, together with the protective provisions contained in the bill, which provisions were written by the upper-basin States themselves and included at their special request, afford proper and adequate protection to the upper basin.

Secretary Work in his report on this bill says:

The provisions relating to the Colorado River compact appear well conceived and I believe are sufficient to afford the necessary protection to all States involved.

The compact is satisfactory to six of the seven States affected. Arizona alone has continued to withhold her approval. More than five years have been consumed in the effort to satisfy Arizona and obtain her ratification, thus making it unanimous. The compact was signed by her commissioner, and at one time lacked only one vote of having the approval of her legislature. It is not thought that Arizona would be injured by its terms.

This development has been much needed for a long time. It has been before Congress continuously since 1921, but has been delayed in the hope of full agreement among the States. Every possible effort seems to have been made. Further delay is not justified. As said by Mr. Hoover before this committee more than two years ago:

I have felt that the public interests of the people involved is so great that the whole of this enormous work should not be held up because of this last remaining fraction of opposition.

The upper basin is protected under the bill. The upper-basin States have physical control of more than 80 per cent of all of the water of the Colorado River system; therefore, if California is bound by the terms of the compact on any basis, the upper basin is fully protected. Necessarily, before any State in the upper basin could be disturbed in her use of water, a lower basin State would be obliged to be a moving party through the courts. With California bound by the compact, they would simply transfer their defense to that State, and California would be obliged to look to their protection.

With these works constructed and owned and operated by the Government and since the United States is the most considerable owner of lands adjacent to the river through its entire length, including its tributaries, the United States is in position to physically enforce such terms and conditions upon the use of the water as it may determine upon. This bill expressly approves the compact and assents to all of its terms so far as the United States is concerned. The representatives of the upper basin States have prepared and submitted numerous protective devices for their own benefit; every one of which has been incorporated in the bill. These amendments not only include the approval by the United States, but subjects the United States and each and every agency thereof to its terms. Not only that, but requires the Secretary of the Interior in the construction and operation of the project to conform to all of the terms and conditions of the compact, and inasmuch as no rights can be acquired in the project except by contract, as specifically required in the bill, this provision is very effective. But, in addition to that, all patents, grants, concessions, easements, rights of way, or other evidence of rights from the United States are impressed with all of the provisions of the compact as a matter of law and many other safeguards are incorporated for their benefit. Nothing further has been suggested and nothing further has been thought of which can add to the protection of the upper basin States. It is thought that their protection is complete.

The passage of the bill, it is thought, will very early make the compact effective and settle an interstate controversy of long standing. Any further delay will almost inevitably lead to an abandonment of the interstate compact as a method of settling rights to the waters of the river and compel resort to other methods and processes which, under the circumstances, would be highly unfortunate.

While the project here authorized is vital to many sections in the lower basin, the bill is no less important to upper basin States. By giving congressional approval to the compact, these States are assured in perpetuity water rights, the value of which can not be overestimated. It is a mistake to think of this bill as one merely for the benefit of California or Nevada or Arizona. By "enthroning the Colorado River compact," it assures to the States of Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming the water rights so essential to their future.

The views of Mr. Garfield in his report on the development said as follows:

Many legal questions have been raised dealing with powers of the several States through which the Colorado River runs: The question of whether the Colorado is subject to ownership by the State, whether the doctrine of beneficial use of riparian rights should govern, and whether Congress has the power to allocate water between the various States. Many of the discussions on those points fail to take into consideration the practical questions which I have attempted to outline. The purpose of the seven-State compact was to settle by agreement the conflicting opinions expressed on many of the legal points to which reference is made. It is unfortunate that the compact has not been ratified; on the other hand, if it be ratified there will still be questions concerning which individuals will disagree and the determination of which can only be effected through the Federal courts.

The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on many questions involved are numerous and with all of which you are thoroughly familiar. I think for the purpose of this report there is no need to refer to any of those decisions. Their general effect conclusively establishes the right of Congress to do that which is suggested in the construction and development of the Boulder Dam.

The seven-State compact was evolved for the purpose of compromising the differences of opinion which have arisen between the people of the various States regarding the development of the Colorado. It is unfortunate that the compact has not been ratified by all the States, but failure of ratification does not prevent the Federal Government from going forward with the construction if Congress so decides. It is also true that no single State could, either directly or indirectly through a corporation created within its jurisdiction, proceed with the development

Throughout all the years of hearings on this development there has been expressed by all witnesses who have appeared before the committee an absolute unanimity of views respecting the existence of flood danger in the lower Colorado River, the urgent need for quick action, and that large storage up the river is the only permanent solution of the flood problem. There has also been a like unanimity of opinion that the construction of the dam and storage at Boulder or Black Canyon, as here authorized, would furnish as complete a solution of the flood danger of the river as could possibly be accomplished.

This unanimity of sentiment was to be expected in view of the physical characteristics of the river, and, particularly, in view of the physical characteristics and situation of Imperial Valley in respect to the Colorado. Here is a great valley, with 450,000 acres of irrigated farms and with populous cities, lying in a great depression or sink from 100 to 300 feet below the channel of the river. The slope toward the valley is much greater than the slope toward the Gulf. Of course, the river at any flood time may break from its shifting and uncertain channel and turn into the valley. The flooding of Imperial Valley would not be like the flooding of other sections, where property damage and perhaps loss of life result, but where soon the water subsides. If the Colorado once breaks into the valley and is not returned to its channel, it means its permanent inundation, there being no outlet for the water. The danger, ever present, of a great flood, has led every responsible Government official who has ever studied the situation to promptly and earnestly recommend immediate steps to remove the danger of such a catastrophe.

LEVEES FURNISH INSUFFICIENT PROTECTION

Efforts toward the protection of Imperial Valley have been made through the construction of levees, with only partial success. In 1905 the river broke into Imperial Valley, and it took two years of heroic efforts and great expense to return the river to its channel toward the Gulf. The United States then expended approximately $1,000,000 in building what was known as Ockerson Levee in Mexico. Hardly was this levee completed until it was washed away.

The river, which theretofore had been flowing almost due southward along the foot of a plateau in Arizona and Mexico, turned westward toward the Volcano Lake region, still in Mexican territory, but in a lower depression on the Delta. The river was kept in this course by an extensive levee system built by the people of Imperial Valley. Gradually, however, this depression filled up. The Imperial irrigation district then, at an expense of approximately $700,000, directed the river through what is known as the Pescadero Cut into a triangular depression lying between the old river channel on the east and the Volcano Lake region on the north and west. This is the one remaining depression on the surface of this delta into which the river can be directed.

The Imperial irrigation district is compelled to maintain a large and expensive organization for the building and maintenance of levees in Mexico. It has built 78 miles of these levees. The district has 60 miles of railroad, trains of dump cars, and other expensive equipment for keeping these levees, which are ever being undermined and destroyed when the river is in flood.

SILT DEPOSITS AGGRAVATE FLOOD DANGER

Reference has already been made to the fact that the Colorado deposits below Yuma yearly more than 100,000 acre-feet of silt. The flood danger from the river is greatly aggravated by this silt, for it was the silt deposit that built the deltaic ridge on which the river now flows, filled the old channel of the river, and later filled the channel toward Volcano Lake. Indeed, any depression which the river finds in which to flow is quickly filled with silt.

Estimates differ as to how long it will take the river to fill up the Pescadero depression, through which it is now flowing. Some say 8 years, some say 20 years. No one knows for certainty. All that is known is that within a comparatively short time it will be filled.

The situation thus adverted to was excellently described by Mr. A. P. Davis, former director of the Reclamation Service, as follows:

In 1920 the situation became so critical that the district undertook at great expense to make a cut from the Bee River Channel to the Pescadero and succeeded in diverting the river into that channel, where it now flows. We now have the condition of relatively high land along the Bee Channel and the levee on the north, running westward to Volcano Lake. We have another ridge which the river followed for a long time and built high, running nearly south from Yuma to the Gulf of California. Between these is a triangular tract which is lower than either, traversed by the Pescadero, in which the river is now flowing. It was testified here that it would take from 15 to 25 years to build up this delta as high as the Bee River ridge. No one can tell even approximately, but it may be assumed that this channel, like the Bee Channel, will begin to grow unstable in 10 or 12 years, though it may be possible to keep the river in its present vicinity considerably longer. It is certain, however, that the river will not fill every part of that triangle of low ground before it begins to give serious trouble.

We know also that the river is now busy in its filling job and will continue it without cessation until it is completed. It will then become again as threatening as it was in 1921, when Imperial Valley was fighting for its life to keep it from overtopping Volcano Lake Levee. As soon as we provide a large desilting reservoir we will hold back the silt and the building process will be checked. If this is done at once, we take advantage of the low areas, and with the silting process checked the river channel will become relatively permanent, on low ground, with no tendency to leave it. Some sediment will come from the Gila, but it is certain that the building-up process will be made much slower and the menace of the river regulated in flow will be removed to a distant date.

If, on the contrary, the large desilting reservoir is postponed, as some people propose, the silting will continue until this basin is filled and the river again flowing on top of a ridge ready to break loose with any freshet and threaten Imperial Valley as it did three years ago. It is clear that the desilting reservoir must be provided quickly, and it must be of large capacity and must form a permanent lake in which all sediment will settle. (Hearings on H. R. 2903, 68th Cong. 1379.)

No estimates have been made as to what the cost would be to dredge an artificial channel across the delta in Mexico after the Pescadero depression is filled. The cost would, of course, be enormous, and doubtless beyond the resources of local communities. The work of so dredging and maintaining a channel would also be surrounded by almost insurmountable difficulties because of being in a foreign jurisdiction, and when completed would be only another temporary expedient, as the river would immediately start its work of filling it with silt.

DAM AT BOULDER CANYON WILL TAKE CARE OF SILT

Almost all of the silt now being discharged by the river is picked up through and above the canyon section and above Boulder Canyon. The proposed great reservoir there will provide ample capacity for interception and storing the silt. More than 300 years would be required to fill the entire reservoir, and this even without the construction of other dams above. In the meantime, of course, other developments will occur further up the river which will intercept large portions of silt discharge, and thus prolong indefinitely the usefulness of this reservoir.

THE EFFECT OF FLOOD DANGER

The danger in which the Imperial Valley always stands of being flooded necessarily creates a feeling of uncertainty. Property values there were less than half of what the income from the property would justify. Money can be had only at excessive interest rates, while Federal farm-loan banks refuse to lend money on Imperial Valley farms.

PART V. ALL-AMERICAN CANAL

The all-American canal is an essential part of the project. When the reclamation of Imperial Valley was first conceived that valley was nothing but a desert waste. There were no values, no money, and no credit. The private corporation which undertook the work found that by making use of an old channel in Mexico water could be diverted from the river and carried into this section at a relatively low cost. With water upon these fertile lands the community developed rapidly, and it was not long until it was found that for a large community to be wholly dependent upon the good faith of a foreign government was not at all satisfactory, but to construct a canal wholly within the United States meant the expenditure of a large sum of money. The financing of this great undertaking by the local communities would be difficult, if not impossible, under good conditions, but with an unstable river and an undependable water supply the difficulties were much increased. Storage and flood control must be had.

Early in the development of Imperial Valley it was found by the promoters of the project that in order to make use of a canal through Mexican territory it was necessary to enter into a contract with that Government whereby lands in Mexico were given the right to take one-half of the water passing through the canal. During recent years development has proceeded in that country to the extent that at the present time something more than 200,000 acres of land is receiving water from the canal system. This can and doubtless will under present conditions continue to be increased year by year, and under the concession they would have the right to increase their use by 200,000 acres before the people of Imperial Valley would have the right to complain. In other words, they have the right to use as much water in Mexico under this contract or concession as the people in Imperial Valley use.

The Boulder Dam, together with the all-American canal, makes possible the physical control of the river by our Government so that undue or unreasonable extension of the use of water in Mexico may be prevented and treaty rights and obligations enforced. In this regard, the all-American canal is essential to the protection of American water rights in the whole of the Colorado River Basin.

ALL-AMERICAN CANAL FEASIBLE

The all-American canal, as to its feasibility, cost, and economic necessity was discussed by the special advisers to the Secretary of the Interior in their recent report, as follows:

Mr. DURAND. From the above it seems a fair conclusion that while the blow and drift sand will present a problem in connection with the maintenance of the canal, there seems no ground whatever for counting this problem as one of serious or of controlling importance, and in no case as likely to involve an item of expense of any serious import in connection with the operation of the canal.

Passing now to the question of the engineering or economic feasibility of the canal under (a) and (b) above, it should be noted that the entire question reduces to one of cost. There is no question whatever of the engineering feasibility of the undertaking. The operations required are all well known and are all within the domain of present well established and approved engineering practice. The section of the canal through the so-called "sand dune" district is the only part of the construction regarding which any serious question under this score has been raised.

Referring to cost estimates, after discussing the basis of his conclusions, Mr. Durand said:

The statement therefore seems justified that the downward trend in many of the unit prices since 1919 combined with definite improvements in the mechanical equipment required for work of this character have created a new situation with regard to the costs of such work and with the same margin for contingencies as assumed in the report of 1919, would justify a downward revision of the costs as presented in that report. Or otherwise if the estimate of cost be held the same, it would imply a very considerably increased margin for contingencies or unforeseen factors in the undertaking.

Such a reestimate has indeed been made by a consulting engineer of Los Angeles, Mr. C. G. Frisbie, a consulting engineer with wide experience in work of this character and with large personal experience in and familiarity with the conditions in the Imperial Valley through which the canal is to pass.

These estimates show a probable cost of about $20,000,000 as against the $30,000,000 of the report of 1919.

The undersigned has gone over these estimates carefully with Mr. Frisbie and has become convinced broadly that the improvements made during the past eight years in the mechanical equipment for excavating and handling the materials as well as other collateral economic conditions are such as to justify the expectation of reduced unit prices and of the construction of the canal at an over-all cost somewhat below the figures originally estimated.

Governor EMERSON. The best solution of the situation would be the construction of the all-American canal.

Governor SCRUGHAM. Economically this canal will be an advantage in that it will permit the irrigation of an additional 200,000 acres by gravity, and keep the sources of water supply and transmission entirely in the United States. Under present conditions, the fact that the main canal to the Imperial Valley is partly in Mexican territory is a continuous source of irritation. The proposed canal itself is undoubtedly feasible from an engineering point of view. All operations necessary for construction are of common practice and offer no special difficulties. Opponents of the project have represented that a section of the line, known as the sand dunes, would require prohibitive costs for construction and that drifting sand would quickly fill the canal. These fears do not seem to be well founded. The Suez Canal traverses similar sand dunes, and no special construction or maintenance difficulties were encountered. Canals through sand hills were examined in certain localities in the United States, and no serious troubles were reported. There has been a marked improvement in excavating machinery in very recent years which will tend to cut the unit costs of moving yardage to figures less than estimated in the report of 1919 made on the subject. There appears, no doubt, but the canal can be constructed within the estimated sums. In the matter of keeping the canal clear of drift sand, the testimony of observers is that there is appreciable sand movement only about 60 days a year, and the rate of advance of the dunes is almost negligible. A concrete road, now running through the low passes in the dunes, report very little sand accumulations, and no difficulty whatever in keeping the road open for traffic. Even if the sand accumulations were much greater than anticipated, the lining of the sand-dune canal section with concrete, increasing the gradient and covering the banks with vegetation, doubtless obliterate most of the difficulties.

Governor EMERSON. The international situation applying to the Colorado River is of much importance, but the construction of the described project need not await solution. In fact, the undertaking should prove of material assistance in solving the international problem.

Reference is made by Secretary Work's special advisers to the all-American canal report of 1919.

In 1918 the Secretary of the Interior and the Imperial irrigation district entered into a joint contract for a study of an all-American canal to connect the Imperial Valley with the Colorado River without the necessity of going through Mexico. A joint board was created consisting of Dr. Elwood Mead, representing the University of California; C. E. Grunskey, representing the Imperial irrigation district; and W. W. Schlecht, representing the United States. This board made an extensive study of the problems involved and recommended the construction of the canal.

Much testimony was heard by the committee on this feature of the project, and it is thought that the construction thereof is not only entirely feasible from engineering and economic views, but is necessary to the immediate safeguarding and protection of the water supply of the lower communities, and to the ultimate conservation of the waters of the Colorado River for use in the United States.

PART VI. DOMESTIC WATER SUPPLY

The relation of the matter of domestic water supply to the project here authorized is important. First, it assures beyond question of doubt the financial integrity of the project. The largest agency, which by contract will assume the obligation of reimbursing the Government for the cost of the project with interest, will undoubtedly be a public district comprising a large group of cities in southern California, which will contract both for storage of water at the dam, with its delivery at a point on the river, and also for a large block of the power necessary to pump a domestic water supply to an elevation of 1,200 or 1,300 feet in order to get the water over a pass into southern California.

Second, the project is so shaped that it will make possible the securing of a domestic water supply. Other plans of development tentatively suggested have not been adequate to this end.

The coastal belt in southern California, having a population at present of nearly 2,000,000, is fast reaching the limit of its available domestic supply, and careful investigations have shown that the populous cities of this coastal plain, including the city of Los Angeles, must for their own security acquire an added source of domestic water supply, and that the Colorado presents the only place where this may be secured.

Some years ago the city of Los Angeles went to Owens Valley and constructed a great aqueduct 240 miles in length to augment local sources. Even this added supply is not proving sufficient for the needs of the city.

Nearly three years ago that city voted a bond issue of $2,000,000 for preliminary surveys and investigations respecting the securing of a supply from the Colorado River, and a large part of this money has been expended, and the work done has established the feasibility of the plan, if and provided there is large storage of the flood waters of the river.

The formation of a large public district, comprising the cities of Los Angeles, Pasadena, Glendale, Orange County cities, and such other cities as desire to join, is in process of formation for the purpose of building the necessary aqueduct from the river to the coast to supply these cities with domestic water. This aqueduct will be approximately 250 miles in length and cost around $150,000,000. Because of intervening mountain ranges it will be necessary to pump the water some 1,300 feet. While this will be costly, a cheap and dependable source of power will not only reduce the financial burden but is necessary to make the project at all feasible.

The amount of water required by these cities is 1,500 second-feet. This, of course, will not all be necessary at once, but at these cities are growing rapidly, they must look to the future and provide for their vital necessities.

To raise a full 1,500 second-feet to an elevation of 1,300 feet will ultimately require approximately 350,000 firm horsepower of electricity. This district will be an applicant for a contract for sufficient power at the dam to handle the necessary pumping.

Large storage at Boulder Canyon is ideally fitted to make it possible for these cities to procure a domestic water supply. The capacity of the reservoir is sufficiently large that there may be obtained enough storage to protect against dry years or against the upper basin States retaining all or substantially all of the flow of the river during a period of dry years. Full conservation thus effected will permit of the utilization of water for a domestic supply without impinging upon irrigation requirements. The dam and reservoir also accomplish certain desilting processes essential to successful consummation of the plan of securing domestic water supply.

PART VII. POWER

Power may well be described as the burden bearer of the project here authorized.

A low flood-control dam would cost approximately two-thirds as much as the dam here authorized, and represents an outlay by the Federal Treasury which could not be recovered. By providing for a dam of the height here authorized the floods of the river will be fully conserved, irrigation uses fully protected, opportunity afforded to populous cities of the coast to secure a necessary domestic water supply, and hydroelectric power will be made available in such amount and of such desirability as will bear a major portion of the cost of the entire development.

An eager market awaits this power. Private utilities would secure a part of it. The great district contemplating a water supply will desire a very substantial part; cities like Los Angeles, Pasadena, Glendale, and Riverside are applicants. States contiguous to the dam will want their share. In short, there can be no doubt but that all the power will be contracted for at once.

It is not strange that this is so, for the power will be desirable power. According to the estimates of the Reclamation Service, if the Government builds the power plants, and the electric energy is sold at the switchboard at 3 mills per kilowatt-hour, this price will take care of all operating and maintenance expense, interest on the cost of the all-American canal, and with revenues from sale of water insure the retirement of the entire investment of the Government with interest within a period of 25 years.

There will become available upon the construction of the dam 550,000 firm or constant horsepower. Conditions indicate that this would be used upon a 55 per cent load factor, calling for the installation at the dam of plants with an installed capacity of 1,000,000 horsepower. This equipment will be installed in units of approximately 100,000 horsepower.

Units can, of course, be installed as the market calls for the power.

Furthermore, some of the power will be available while the dam is in course of construction. Thus the release of this large amount of power will not come in one block but only gradually as it can be absorbed by the market.

There were many indications in the testimony adduced before the committee that there would be considerable competition to secure this very desirable power. The committee has so framed the legislation to guard as fully as might be against this asset, created by Federal initiative, being monopolized by any one agency. The bill contemplates that the power will be fairly and equitably distributed amongst the various agencies applying therefore, thus insuring the widest and fairest possible distribution of the benefits.

PART VIII. AUTHORITY OF THE GOVERNMENT

The authority of the United States to undertake this necessary construction can not be seriously questioned.

While the navigability of the Colorado River has not been judicially determined evidence has been presented which would tend toward the conclusion that the river is navigable as a matter of law. The proposed dam would improve navigation probably more than any other works which could be constructed. The dam will so regulate the flow as to make the river very practicable of navigation for 200 miles below and impounded water above which could easily be navigated for more than 75 miles.

The rights of the United States under the commerce clause of the Constitution to construct works in a navigable stream to improve navigation is settled beyond all possible question. It is also brought to the attention of the committee that there are two transcontinental railroads and three Federal-aid transcontinental highways crossing the river below the Boulder Dam site. These five interstate lines of commerce would be safeguarded against the possibility of destruction by floods on the river by the construction of the proposed dam. The commerce clause of the Constitution refers to commerce by land as well as by water.

The proposed dam will provide the initial facilities for the ultimate reclamation of perhaps 1,000,000 acres of public lands. These lands are property of the United States over which the United States is sovereign. With irrigation they may ultimately be very valuable but in their present desert state they have practically no value at all. To provide water for irrigation storage as contemplated by the construction of the proposed dam is essential. The right of the United States to reclaim and improve its lands has long since been adjudicated.

The United States is the most considerable property owner along the lower Colorado River. Great floods may make the reclamation of this property impossible. The United States has invested many millions of dollars in the Yuma project under the Bureau of Reclamation, including the Laguna Dam and 17 miles of main canal in California and the great siphon under the river to the Arizona side and a hydroelectric power plant at the cost of $250,000 on this main canal in California for the benefit of the Yuma project. Only a small part of this great investment has been yet repaid. A great flood would destroy these works and make impossible the repayment to the United States of the moneys invested. Clearly the United States is authorized to do such works as the Congress deems necessary to protect its own property. Under this authority the Government has already expended the sum of $2,840,000 or thereabouts for the protection of the Yuma project from floods. This money was expended for levees and it is estimated that the annual maintenance of the same will amount to $100,000 indefinitely.

The Hon. James R. Garfield, former Secretary of the Interior and special adviser to the present Secretary of the Interior, made a study of the problems involved during the summer of 1927, and in his report says:

> The right of Congress to construct the proposed dam is derived from the commerce clause of the Constitution, its control over the public domain, its control over the navigable streams, its obligations to deal with international relations and interests, its powers under the reclamation law, and its rights as a landowner. In the exercise of those powers it may do such things as are necessary and incident to the exercise of those powers. Its right to exercise those powers has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.
> * * * It is urged by some that Congress is without authority to authorize appropriations for the development and sale of power. I am of the opinion that this position is not sound. Such appropriations would be incidental to the main purpose of the construction of the dam and would clearly come within powers of Congress. The question is not academic for the reasons that the United States has already constructed, through the Bureau of Reclamation, a number of power plants and has sold the power for the purposes suggested in the present instance, and no attack upon the exercise of that power has been successful.

PART IX. FORM OF BILL

The bill herewith presented has been given consideration commensurate with the great project it authorizes and the various purposes its enactment will accomplish.

It has undergone many changes and improvements. New ideas have been incorporated. The financial plan was prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury. Provisions to settle water rights on the river have come largely from the official representatives of upper-basin States. Valuable suggestions have originated in Federal departments having to do with the development.

The project is an intricate one. One phase has its effect upon another and apparently unrelated aspect. Each phase has been carefully covered by the bill without impinging upon any other phase.

Approximately one-third of the bill deals with the matter of interstate water rights and the Colorado River compact, and approximately one-quarter of it deals with the financial features. As to the administration of the project this has not been burdened with undue details. Necessarily, something must be left to responsible administrative agencies. This has been done and the Secretary of the Interior, who is charged with the duty of financing and managing the development, is given a reasonable leeway in arranging contracts, fixing prices, and allocating benefits. This is illustrated in the optional provisions respecting power. The Secretary may lease the right to use the water at the dam or he may construct plants and sell power at the switchboard, as may seem best to him, to the end that he may meet the requirement of completely financing the project—and this largely through the disposition of power or power rights. Fundamentals are covered. Details are appropriately left to be worked out by the Secretary.

Again, Governor Emerson, in speaking to this point in his recent report to the Secretary of the Interior, said:

> The general principles of the measure introduced in Congress and identified under the name of the Swing-Johnson bill embody a plan generally satisfactory for the undertaking by the Federal Government of the construction of the Black or Boulder Canyon project and the all-American canal. The undertaking of these constructive projects would be of great value and would afford solution of the major physical problems now applying to the Colorado River.

CONCLUSION

This bill should be passed because—

First. Congress should no longer risk a flood catastrophe to Imperial Valley—a catastrophe which further delay only courts.

Second. Reclamation possibilities in the lower basin should be safeguarded and taken care of before it is too late. Unless something is done the river will be acquired for power development exclusively. Mexico is constantly building up added claims to its waters.

Third. The Mexican situation must be met. It is not sound policy to allow a condition to continue by which that country may and will go on using more and more water from the river, and this at the expense of existing and future irrigation in the United States.

Fourth. The Government should aid its people to secure their necessities in the way of domestic water supply, where it can do so, as here, without cost and as an incident in carrying out other Federal purposes such as river regulation and reclamation.

Fifth. It will convert a natural menace into a national asset.

Sixth. A financial scheme is presented by which the development will be completely prefinanced, thus fully protecting the Federal Treasury and the general taxpayer.

Seventh. It settles in large part water rights between States in a sensible and practical way, substituting interstate agreements for interminable litigation and controversy. Further delay points to the latter untoward results and the disintegration of the plan of settling water rights by interstate compact.

There is submitted herewith for the information of the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior addressed to me recommending the enactment of the legislation which was before the House in the last Congress dated January 18, 1926, and a letter from the Secretary to me recommending the pending bill dated January 4, 1928; also a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury dated April 5, 1926, concerning the financial provisions of the bill which was under consideration during the last Congress; also the law of April 19, 1921, authorizing the appointment of commissioners to divide the waters of the Colorado River, and a copy of the Colorado River compact, signed at Santa Fe, N. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 18, 1926.

Hon. ADDISON T. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: I have received your letter of January 14, transmitting, with request for report, a copy of H. R. 6251, entitled "A bill to provide for the protection and development of the lower Colorado River Basin."

Instead of discussing the provisions of this bill section by section, I desire to submit some suggestions regarding the policy and procedure to be followed in this development and the legislation required to secure the desired results. It is assumed that the dam and reservoir to be created are essentially those described in a report of the Bureau of Reclamation dated February 28, 1924, which proposes a dam 550 feet high and a reservoir to impound 26,000,000 acre-feet of water, and that the all-American canal for connecting the Colorado River with the Imperial and Coachella Valleys is substantially the one described in Senate Document No. 142 and in the report of the all-American canal board, published in 1920.

It is my understanding that the primary purpose of this scheme is to regulate and control the flow of the river below the dam so as to lessen the menace from floods to low-lying land below; to increase the water supply for irrigation in seasons of drought and provide an adequate water supply at all seasons of the year for household and industrial uses in growing cities and towns; and to generate electric energy both as a means of making this project a financially solvent undertaking and contributing to the general prosperity of the southwestern part of the country. The general plan and purpose of this measure has my support, and I favor it being made a national undertaking, to be carried out and administered by the Federal Government.

Interstate and international rights and interests involve the diversified benefits from the construction of these works, the waiting necessities of cities for increased water supplies, the large development of latent agricultural resources, the protection of these already developed and the immense industrial benefits which may come from the production of cheap power, which together appear to render the construction and subsequent control of these works a measure of such economic and social importance that no agency but the Federal Government should be intrusted with the protection of rights or distribution of its opportunities. All uses can be coordinated and the fullest benefits realized only by their centralized control.

I shall therefore consider this development as including three features:

(1) A dam approximately 550 feet high, creating a reservoir holding 26,000,000 acre-feet of water.

(2) Works for the generation of electric power.

(3) An all-American canal starting at Laguna Dam and delivering water to the Imperial and Coachella Valley canals.

The reservoir should be regulated primarily to safeguard the valleys in Arizona and California, including Imperial Valley with its present extensive development from the destructive effect of large floods. Water levels in the reservoir would be raised during flood periods and lowered at other times, thus equalizing the discharge of the river below and securing a regulated flow for irrigation and power. The water so impounded should be sold to cities requiring it for domestic purposes and other municipal uses and to irrigation districts, like that of the Imperial Valley, desiring a complete or supplemental water supply under the provisions of the Warren Act, payment to be made for a definite volume of water each year.

The electric energy generated should be sold to the highest and best bidders, with due regard to public interest, at the swichboard of the power plant. Contracts should not exceed 50 years in duration. Transmission of power and its distribution to be provided by the purchasers.

Water supplied for domestic, industrial, or irrigation uses should be delivered at the dam, at points along the river agreed upon, and at the terminal of the all-American canal. Prices for this water should be such as to at least repay all of the cost of operation and maintenance of the canals and an equitable part of the operating expenses of the dam. This, with the revenues from power, will, we believe, repay the entire investment in this development, with 4 per cent interest.

The money for this development should, I believe, be provided by a bond issue of the United States. It should be for a sum sufficient to provide for the construction of the dam, the power plant, and the all-American canal. An additional sum should be included in the authorization to pay interest on bonds sold during the period of construction, and until such time as the revenue will meet interest charges. Providing the money for this development through a special bond issue will obviate disturbance of the regular fiscal operations of the Government. It will obviate provision by the Budget for the money needed during construction. The bonds could be sold as money would be needed. Construction would extend over a period of between 5 and 10 years if work were carried on at a rate to secure the greatest efficiency.

In the sale of water to irrigation districts and municipalities the provisions of the reclamation act and of the Warren Act would apply.

Such an adjustment of burdens and benefits should stimulate irrigation development because of the generous terms on which water will be supplied and at the same time result in a considerable revenue from the water furnished for irrigation, domestic, and industrial uses. But the money-earning feature of this development is power. The revenue from the sale of power will, it is believed, alone repay the entire cost of these works with interest at 4 per cent.

With this general outline of the development program favored, I submit comments on features of the bill which are approved and others which it is believed should be modified.

The necessity for the all-American canal and the size and cost of this canal depend largely on whether the existing concession under which water is now diverted from the Colorado River at Hanlons Heading and carried through Mexico to irrigators in the Imperial Valley can be modified. If it can not be, then the all-American canal becomes an indispensable part of this development. Under this contract or concession the Mexican Government gave a corporation permission[1] to build and operate a canal across Mexican territory to irrigate land in California on condition that Mexican irrigators be given, if they desire it, one-half of all the water diverted into this canal from the Colorado River. Hence the canal has to be double the capacity required to meet the needs of California. The river has to supply double the water needed in California, and the rights of Mexicans to water under this concession grow as the irrigated area is extended in California.

The canal now supplies water for the irrigation of over 400,000 acres in California, and irrigators in Mexico at present require water for the irrigation of 200,000 acres. But Mexican irrigators are entitled under this concession to double the volume they are now using, or for enough to irrigate as many acres as are now irrigated in California. That is more water than the unregulated flow of the river will now supply. As the Mexican irrigators are on the upper end of the canal, the pinch of scarcity, when it has come in the past or when it may come in the future, falls first on irrigators in the United States, which country supplies the water, all the construction cost, and all the money advanced for operation. It is unfair to California irrigators now and will be even more so after the reservoir is built.

It is physically possible to irrigate much more than 400,000 acres from this canal in Mexico. If this concession remains in force without any amendment and the canal continues to be used as now, the irrigated area in Mexico will continue to extend. The volume needed to be diverted from the river would be more than the direct flow at the low-water season, and the area irrigated in California would be subject to ruinous uncertainties and loss. If storage is provided, a part of the water for the irrigation of lands in Mexico would, under this concession, have to be supplied from the reservoir, as this canal would be the only means of conveying water to the Imperial Valley, and it can be operated only if the terms of the Mexican concession are complied with.

If, however, the Government of Mexico would consent to a modification of this concession and definitely limit the volume of water to which Mexican irrigators would be entitled, then the future use of the present canal would be economical and desirable, a smaller high line could be built and utilized mainly for the irrigation of the higher lands of the Imperial and Coachella Valleys. Thus far no negotiations for the modification of this concession have been made. It is not known what the attitude of the Mexican Government would be, and plans for this development should therefore include provision for an all-American canal as an essential part of the scheme.

The building of a unified power plant by the Federal Government in the place of allocating power privileges, as proposed in the bill, is regarded as more efficient and cheaper. It will obviate controversies between applicants, and long delays in their adjustment. In the end, results will, I believe, be superior to those possible under an allocation of privileges. The area for the location of separate power sites is restricted. Allotments would not be equal in value. Some allottees would, therefore, have an advantage over others. It would result in the creation of operation and administration controversies to be avoided and which a unified development will avert.

The transmission lines for the distribution and retailing of this power should be financed by its purchasers. To secure the greatest economy, main transmission lines leading to different localities should be constructed for joint use. This plan of power development is not an experiment. It has been adopted by the Government with satisfactory results in the construction of other reclamation works where the generation of power is an incident to irrigation development. Salt River, Minidoka, Lahontan, and Guernsey are illustrations.

Section 6 provides that no part of the construction cost of the dam and the appurtenant works shall be charged against any lands irrigated by the waters of the reservoir. If the all-American canal is to be considered as an appurtenant work, the bill should be amended. It is believed that the sales of water from this canal will return not only the cost of operation and maintenance but pay construction costs without interest, as is done on other reclamation projects.

All revenues from power, irrigation, and domestic water supplies should be placed in a common fund and used for the payment of interest, operating expenses, and build up a sinking fund for redeeming the entire bond issue.

In order to give assurance before any large expenditure is incurred that the anticipated revenues from this development will be obtained, the bill should contain a provision that before any bonds are issued and sold, and before awarding any contracts for construction, the Secretary of the Interior shall secure the execution of contracts with irrigation districts, municipalities, and corporations, on terms to be fixed, for the delivery of all water to be supplied for irrigation, domestic, and municipal uses, and shall obtain definite commitment for the purchase of power from responsible bidders in an amount to insure a sufficient return from this development to repay the money to be expended with interest within a period of 50 years.

Section 8, which provides for the distribution and use of all water for irrigation, power, and otherwise, in accordance with the Colorado River compact, seems well conceived and is a necessary part of this legislation. This appears to afford ample protection and assurance to those States included in the upper division of the watershed against the creation of a priority of right through the building of these works, which would impair in any way their right to the volume of water guaranteed to that division in the compact. I suggest for consideration amendment to the effect that the benefits to be derived from this development shall be available only to those States or the citizens of those States which have ratified the compact.

I suggest the amendment of section 9 as follows: In line 1, page 11, strike out the words "the proportionate share" and insert in lieu thereof the words "an equitable share in accordance with the benefits received." After the word "lands" in line 15 insert "subject, however, to the provisions of subsection C of section 4, act of December 5, 1924 (43 Stat. 702)." The first amendment suggested is designed to avoid the necessity of fixing a flat-rate charge without regard to the classification or quality of the land. Experience has shown that a flat-rate charge is undesirable in some cases. The second amendment I believe of prime importance. If soldiers and sailors are to be given a preference, experience has shown that provision should be made for selection. This is desirable for the protection of all prospective entrymen, soldiers, and sailors, as well as civilians.

[1] The Sociedad de Riego y Terrenos de la Baja California S. A. is authorized to carry through the canal which it has built in Mexican territory, and through other canals that it may build, if convenient, water to an amount of 284 cubic meters (10,000 cubic feet) per second from the waters taken from the Colorado River in territory of the United States by the California Development Co., and which waters this company has ceded to the Sociedad de Riego y Terrenos de la Baja California S. A. It is also authorized to carry to the lands of the United States the water with the exception of that mentioned in the following article.

From the water mentioned in the foregoing article enough shall be used to irrigate the lands susceptible of irrigation in Lower California with the water carried through the canal or canals, without in any case the amount of water used exceeding one-half of the volume of water passing through said canals.

Since section 1 provides for the building of a dam either at Black Canyon or Boulder Canyon, I suggest that line 11, section 10, be amended so as to designate the subfund there mentioned as the "Colorado River dam fund," which would be applicable in either case. The present designation might possibly prove a misnomer. I suggest the following proviso be inserted at the end of section 10 of the bill:

"Provided, however, That no work shall be begun and no moneys expended on or in connection with the works or structures provided for in this act until the respective legislatures of at least six of the signatory States mentioned in section 13 hereof shall have approved the Colorado River compact mentioned in said section 13 and shall have consented to a waiver of the provision of the first paragraph of article 11 of said compact making the same binding and obligatory when it shall have been approved by the legislatures of each of the seven signatory States, and until the President, by public proclamation, shall have declared that the said compact has been approved by and become binding and obligatory upon at least six of the signatory States."

An approximate estimate of costs, operating expenses, and income leaves no question as to the ultimate solvency of this undertaking if carried out along the lines proposes. The main source of revenue will be power, and the rate assumed is lower than the wholesale prices now being paid in the West. Those of which we have information range from 3½ to 8 mills per kilowatt-hour, measured at the switchboard. As the largest consumers of this power would be distant, a low figure of 3 mills per kilowatt-hour at the switchboard has been assumed in the estimates which follow:

Colorado River development—Boulder Canyon Reservoir, all-American canal

CAPITAL INVESTMENT

Estimated cost for—
26,000,000-acre-foot reservoir	$41,500,000
1,000,000-horsepower development	31,500,000
The all-American canal	31,000,000
Interest during construction on above, 5 years, at 4 per cent	21,000,000
Total	125,000,000

ANNUAL OPERATION

Estimated gross revenues from—
Sale 3.6 billion kilowatt-hours power at 3/10 cent	10,800,000
Storage and delivery of water for irrigation and domestic purposes	1,500,000
Total	12,300,000
Estimated fixed annual charges for—
Operation and maintenance, storage and power	700,000
Operation and maintenance, all-American canal	500,000
Interest on $125,000,000, at 4 per cent	5,000,000
Total	6,200,000

Estimated annual surplus, $6,100,000, or thought to be sufficient to repay the entire cost in 25 years.

The height of this dam as fixed will not prevent the construction of the proposed dams at Diamond Creek or Bridge Canyon. The approval of this project should open the way for other development and encourage the construction of projects above this dam for development of irrigation, power, or other purposes.

Although the difficulties of construction and magnitude of the proposed structure compared with any other for similar purposes are unprecedented, assuming that it is a feasible engineering possibility, the Reclamation Bureau of the Department of the Interior as now organized, with its present commissioner, is competent to construct the works contemplated in S. 1868.

With the amendments suggested, I recommend the favorable consideration of this bill by Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

HUBERT WORK.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR ON H. R. 5773

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 4, 1928.

Hon. ADDISON T. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: I have letter from the clerk of your committee of December 9, transmitting, with a request for report, a copy of H. R. 5773, entitled "A bill to provide for the construction of works for the protection and development of the lower Colorado River Basin, for the approval of the Colorado River compact, and for other purposes."

This bill is very similar in its general aspects to S. 1868, Sixty-ninth Congress, and other bills for this purpose upon which the department has heretofore reported.

The dam and reservoir to be created presumably are essentially those described in the report of the Bureau of Reclamation dated February 28, 1924, which proposes the construction of a dam substantially 550 feet high and a reservoir to impound 26,000,000 acre-feet of water. The present bill provides for construction of a reservoir with a capacity of not less than 20,000,000 acre-feet.

The all-American canal for connecting the Colorado River with the Imperial and Coachella Valleys, the construction of which is provided for, is substantially the one described in Senate Document No. 142 and in the report of the All-American Canal Board published in 1920.

It is my understanding that the primary purpose of this scheme is to regulate and control the flow of the river below the dam, so as to lessen the menace from floods to low-lying land below, to increase the water supply for irrigation in seasons of drought, and provide an adequate water supply at all seasons of the year for household and industrial uses in growing cities and towns, and to generate electric energy both as a means of making this project a financially solvent undertaking, and contributing to the general prosperity of the southwestern part of the country. The general plan and purpose of this measure have my support, and I favor its being made a national undertaking, to be carried out and administered by the Federal Government.

The settlement of interstate and international problems growing out of the use of this river will be promoted by the construction of these works. It will give a more definite basis for negotiations of the International Water Commission appointed by authority of the last Congress in formulating the basis of a treaty with Mexico. The diversified benefits and the new rights to be created include the necessities of cities for increased water supply, the large development of latent agricultural resources, the protection of those already developed, and the industrial benefits which may come from the production of cheap power. These factors appear to render the construction and subsequent control of these works a measure of such economic and social importance that no agency other than the Federal Government should be intrusted with the protection of rights or distribution of its opportunities. All uses can be coordinated and the fullest benefits realized only by their centralized national control.

I shall therefore consider this development as including three features:

(1) A dam approximately 550 feet high creating a reservoir holding not less than 20,000,000 acre-feet of water.

(2) Works for the generation of electric power.

(3) An all-American canal starting at Laguna Dam and delivering water to the Imperial and Coachella Valley Canals.

The reservoir should be regulated, primarily to safeguard the valleys in Arizona and California, including Imperial Valley with its present extensive development, from the destructive effect of large floods. Water levels in the reservoir would be raised during flood periods and lowered at other times, thus equalizing the discharge of the river below and securing a regulated flow for irrigation and power. The water so impounded should be sold to cities requiring it for domestic purposes and other municipal uses and to irrigation districts, like that of the Imperial Valley, desiring a complete or supplemental water supply under the provisions of the Warren Act, payment to be made for a definite volume of water each year.

The plan incorporated in the bill for power development is approved.

The plan of financing set out in sections 2 and 3 of the bill seems sound.

The all-American canal is an essential part of the plan. It will enable the Government to distribute its stored water effectively and to reach by gravity a large area of land that could otherwise be served only by pumping. If a satisfactory agreement could be reached with Mexico for operation of the existing main canal, it might be possible to defer for a time the construction of the all-American canal, but legislative authority for its construction is a necessary feature of this legislation.

The provisions relating to the Colorado River compact appear well conceived, and I believe are sufficient to afford the necessary protection to all States involved.

It is estimated by the engineers that the sum of $125,000,000 is sufficient to cover construction cost and operating expenses and to finance the project on the plan stated in the bill. There is no reason to question the ultimate solvency of this undertaking if carried out along the lines proposed.

The height of this dam as fixed will not prevent the construction of the proposed dams at Diamond Creek or Bridge Canyon. The approval of this project should open the way for other development and encourage the construction of projects above this dam for development of irrigation, power, or other purposes.

This bill has been referred to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who advises that the proposed legislation would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President unless the pending revenue bill should result in tax reduction in a materially greater amount than that recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the President.

For the reasons stated I recommend the favorable consideration of the bill.

Very truly yours, HUBERT WORK.

LETTER FROM SECRETARY OF TREASURY TO CHAIRMAN SMITH

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 5, 1926.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Under date of March 18, Secretary Mellon addressed to you a letter giving his views on H. R. 9826, being the bill to cover the Boulder Dam project on the Colorado River. In commenting on the fiscal policy in the original bill Secretary Mellon suggested a more flexible method of handling than the bond issue provided in the original bill, and at your request I am herewith submitting a draft of the legislation carrying out the suggestion made by Secretary Mellon in his letter of March 18.

The purpose of this suggestion is to create a fund which will be charged with the cost of construction, plus interest during construction, and into which all revenues from the project will flow, and from which appropriations for operation and maintenance will be made. The fund will also be charged with current interest, and any net earnings of the project, after operation, maintenance, and interest, will be returned to the Treasury and used for debt reduction. The Treasury is given complete flexibility in handling the financing by the United States of the cost of the project.

If Congress adopts the project, the suggestions I have made are quite workable from the Treasury's standpoint.

Very truly yours,

GARRARD B. WINSTON,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. ADDISON T. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation,
House of Representatives.

TENTATIVE SUBSTITUTE FOR SECTION 2 OF H. R. 9826

SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby established a special fund to be known as the "Colorado River dam fund" (hereinafter referred to as the "fund"), and to be available, as hereinafter provided, only for carrying out the provisions of this act. All revenues received in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be paid into, and expenditures shall be made out of, the fund, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to advance to the fund, from time to time and within the appropriations therefor, such amounts as the Secretary of the Interior deems necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act, except that the aggregate amount of such advances shall not exceed the sum of $125,000,000. Interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum accruing during the year upon the amounts so advanced and remaining unpaid shall be paid annually out of the fund.

(c) Moneys in the fund advanced under subdivision (b) shall be available only for expenditures for construction and the payment of interest during construction upon the amounts so advanced. No expenditures out of the fund shall be made for operation and maintenance except from appropriations therefor.

(d) The Secretary of the Treasury shall charge the fund as of June 30 in each year with such amount as may be necessary for the payment of interest on advance made under subdivision (b) at the rate of 4 per centum per annum accrued during the year upon the amounts so advanced and remaining unpaid, except that if the fund is insufficient to meet the payment of interest the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, defer any part of such payment, and the amount so deferred shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until paid.

(e) The Secretary of the Interior shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury at the close of each fiscal year the amount of money in the fund in excess of the amount necessary for construction, operation, and maintenance, and payment of interest. Upon receipt of each such certificate, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to charge the fund with the amount so certified as repayment of the advances made under subdivision (b), which amount shall be covered into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, and shall be available for the purposes specified in subdivision (g).

(f) In order to make the advances to the fund, the Secretary of the Treasury may, if he deems advisable, exercise the authority granted by the various Liberty bond acts and the Victory loan act, as amended and supplemented, to issue bonds, notes, and certificates of indebtedness of the United States, and any bonds so issued shall be disregarded in computing the maximum amount of bonds authorized by section 1, of the second Liberty bond act, as amended.

(g) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to use, upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe for the payment, redemption, or purchase, at not to exceed par and accrued interest, of any bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, the money covered into the Treasury under subdivisions (e) in repayment of the amounts advanced.

ACT AUTHORIZING THE APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS

[Public—No. 56—67th Congress]

An act (H. R. 6877) to permit a compact or agreement between the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming, respecting the disposition and apportionment of the waters of the Colorado River, and for other purposes

Whereas the Colorado River and its several tributaries rise within and flow through or from the boundaries between the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming; and

Whereas the territory included within the drainage area of the said stream and its tributaries is largely arid and in small part irrigated, and the present and future development necessities and general welfare of each of the said States and of the United States require the further use of the waters of said streams for irrigation and other beneficial purposes and that future litigation and conflict respecting the use and distribution of said waters should be avoided and settled by compact between said States; and

Whereas the said States, by appropriate legislation, have authorized the governors thereof to appoint commissioners to represent said States for the purpose of entering into a compact or agreement between said States respecting the future utilization and disposition of the waters of the Colorado River and of the streams tributary thereto; and

Whereas the governors of said several States have named and appointed their respective commissioners for the purposes aforesaid and have presented their resolution to the President of the United States requesting the appointment of a representative on behalf of the United States to participate in said negotiations and to represent the interests of the United States: Now, therefore,

Be itenacted, etc., That consent of Congress is hereby given to the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact or agreement not later than January 1, 1923, providing for an equitable division and apportionment among said States of the water supply of the Colorado River and of the streams tributary thereto, upon condition that a suitable person, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, shall participate in said negotiations as the representative of and for the protection of the interests of the United States, and shall make report to Congress of the proceedings and of any compact or agreement entered into, and the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated to pay the salary and expenses of the representative of the United States appointed hereunder: Provided, That any such compact or agreement shall not be binding or obligatory upon any of the parties thereto unless and until the same shall have been approved by the legislature of each of said States and by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is herewith expressly reserved.

Approved, August 19, 1921.

COLORADO RIVER COMPACT, SIGNED AT SANTA FE, N. MEX., NOVEMBER 24, 1922

The States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming, having resolved to enter into a compact under the act of the Congress of the United States of America, approved August 19, 1921 (42 Stat. L., 171), and the acts of the legislatures of the said States, have through their governors appointed as their commissioners: W. S. Norviel for the State of Arizona, W. F. McClure for the State of California, Delph E. Carpenter for the State of Colorado, J. G. Scrugham for the State of Nevada, Stephen B. Davis, jr., for the State of New Mexico, R. E. Caldwell for the State of Utah, Frank C. Emerson for the State of Wyoming, who, after negotiations participated in by Herbert Hoover, appointed by the President as the representative of the United States of America, have agreed upon the following articles.

ARTICLE I

The major purposes of this compact are to provide for the equitable division and apportionment of the use of the waters of the Colorado River system; to establish the relative importance of different beneficial uses of water; to promote interstate comity; to remove causes of present and future controversies; and to secure the expeditious agricultural and industrial development of the Colorado River Basin, the storage of its waters, and the protection of life and property from floods. To these ends the Colorado River Basin is divided into two basins, and an apportionment of the use of part of the water of the Colorado River system is made to each of them with the provision that further equitable apportionments may be made.

ARTICLE II

As used in this compact:

(a) The term "Colorado River system" means that portion of the Colorado River and its tributaries within the United States of America.

(b) The term "Colorado River Basin" means all of the drainage area of the Colorado River system and all other territory within the United States of America to which the waters of the Colorado River system shall be beneficially applied.

(c) The term "States of the upper division" means the States of Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming.

(d) The term "States of the lower division" means the States of Arizona, California, and Nevada.

(e) The term "Lee Ferry" means a point in the main stream of the Colorado River 1 mile below the mouth of the Paria River.

(f) The term "upper basin" means those parts of the States of Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming within and from which waters naturally drain into the Colorado River system above Lee Ferry, and also all parts of said States located without the drainage area of the Colorado River system which are now or shall hereafter be beneficially served by waters diverted from the system above Lee Ferry.

(g) The term "lower basin" means those parts of the States of Arizona, California, Nevada, New Mexico, and Utah within and from which waters naturally drain into the Colorado River system below Lee Ferry, and also all parts of said States located without the drainage area of the Colorado River system which are now or shall hereafter be beneficially served by waters diverted from the system below Lee Ferry.

(h) The term "domestic use" shall include the use of water for household, stock, municipal, mining, milling, industrial, and other like purposes, but shall exclude the generation of electrical power.

ARTICLE III

(a) There is hereby apportioned from the Colorado River system in perpetuity to the upper basin and to the lower basin, respectively, the exclusive beneficial consumptive use of 7,500,000 acre-feet of water per annum, which shall include all water necessary for the supply of any rights which may now exist.

(b) In addition to the apportionment in paragraph (a) the lower basin is hereby given the right to increase its beneficial consumptive use of such waters by 1,000,000 acre-feet per annum.

(c) If, as a matter of international comity, the United States of America shall hereafter recognize in the United States of Mexico any right to the use of any waters of the Colorado River system, such waters shall be supplied first from the waters which are surplus over and above the aggregate of the quantities specified in paragraphs (a) and (b); and if such surplus shall prove insufficient for this purpose, then the burden of such deficiency shall be equally borne by the upper basin and the lower basin, and whenever necessary the States of the upper division shall deliver at Lee Ferry water to supply one-half of the deficiency so recognized in addition to that provided in paragraph (d).

(d) The States of the upper division will not cause the flow of the river at Lee Ferry to be depleted below an aggregate of 75,000,000 acre-feet for any period of 10 consecutive years reckoned in continuing progressive series beginning with the 1st day of October next succeeding the ratification of this compact.

(e) The States of the upper division shall not withhold water, and the States of the lower division shall not require the delivery of water, which can not reasonably be applied to domestic and agricultural uses.

(f) Further equitable apportionment of the beneficial uses of the waters of the Colorado River system unapportioned by paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) may be made in the manner provided in paragraph (g) at any time after October 1, 1963, if and when either basin shall have reached its total beneficial consumptive use as set out in paragraph (a) and (b).

(g) In the event of a desire for a further apportionment as provided in paragraph (f) any two signatory States, acting through their governors, may give joint notice of such desire to the governors of the other signatory States and to the President of the United States of America, and it shall be the duty of the governors of the signatory States and of the President of the United States of America forthwith to appoint representatives, whose duty it shall be to divide and apportion equitably between the upper basin and lower basin the beneficial use of the unapportioned water of the Colorado River system as mentioned in paragraph (f), subject to the legislative ratification of the signatory States and the Congress of the United States of America.

ARTICLE IV

(a) Inasmuch as the Colorado River has ceased to be navigable for commerce and the reservation of its waters for navigation would seriously limit the development of its basin, the use of its waters for purposes of navigation shall be subservient to the uses of such waters for domestic, agricultural, and power purposes. If the Congress shall not consent to this paragraph, the other provisions of this compact shall nevertheless remain binding.

(b) Subject to the provisions of this compact, water of the Colorado River system may be impounded and used for the generation of electrical power, but such impounding and use shall be subservient to the use and consumption of such water for agricultural and domestic purposes and shall not interfere with or prevent use for such dominant purposes.

(c) The provisions of this article shall not apply to or interfere with the regulation and control by any State within its boundaries of the appropriation, use, and distribution of water.

ARTICLE V

The chief official of each signatory State charged with the administration of water rights, together with the Director of the United States Reclamation Service and the Director of the United States Geological Survey, shall cooperate, ex officio—

(a) To promote the systematic determination and coordination of the facts as to flow, appropriation, consumption, and use of water in the Colorado River Basin, and the interchange of available information in such matters.

(b) To secure the ascertainment and publication of the annual flow of the Colorado River at Lee Ferry.

(c) To perform such other duties as may be assigned by mutual consent of the signatories from time to time.

ARTICLE VI

Should any claim or controversy arise between any two or more of the signatory States: (a) With respect to the waters of the Colorado River system not covered by the terms of this compact; (b) over the meaning or performance of any of the terms of this compact; (c) as to the allocation of the burdens incident to the performance of any article of this compact or the delivery of waters as herein provided; (d) as to the construction or operation of works within the Colorado River Basin to be situated in two or more States, or to be constructed in one State for the benefit of another State; or (e) as to the diversion of water in one State for the benefit of another State, the governors of the States affected upon the request of one of them, shall forthwith appoint commissioners with power to consider and adjust such claim or controversy, subject to ratification by the legislatures of the States so affected.

Nothing herein contained shall prevent the adjustment of any such claim or controversy by any present method or by direct future legislative action of the interested States.

ARTICLE VII

Nothing in this compact shall be construed as affecting the obligations of the United States of America to Indian tribes.

ARTICLE VIII

Present perfected rights to the beneficial use of waters of the Colorado River system are unimpaired by this contract. Whenever storage capacity of 5,000,000 acre-feet shall have been provided on the main Colorado River within or for the benefit of the lower basin, then claims of such rights, if any, by appropriators or users of water in the lower basin against appropriators or users of water in the upper basin shall attach to and be satisfied from water that may be stored not in conflict with Article III.

All other rights to beneficial use of waters of the Colorado River system shall be satisfied solely from the water apportioned to that basin in which they are situate.

ARTICLE IX

Nothing in this compact shall be construed to limit or prevent any State from instituting or maintaining any action or proceeding, legal or equitable, for the protection of any right under this compact or the enforcement of any of its provisions.

ARTICLE X

This compact may be terminated at any time by the unanimous agreement of the signatory States. In the event of such termination, all rights established under it shall continue unimpaired.

ARTICLE XI

This compact shall become binding and obligatory when it shall have been approved by the legislatures of each of the signatory States and by the Congress of the United States. Notice of approval by the legislatures shall be given by the governor of each signatory State to the governors of the other signatory States and to the President of the United States, and the President of the United States is requested to give notice to the governors of the signatory States of approval by the Congress of the United States.

In witness whereof the commissioners have signed this compact in a single original, which shall be deposited in the archives of the Department of State of the United States of America and of which a duly certified copy shall be forwarded to the governor of each of the signatory States.

THE BOARD OF APPEALS AND MEDICAL ADMINISTRATION OF THE VETERANS' BUREAU

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to speak for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I desire to correct the RECORD in the remarks I made as reported on page 8347 by inserting "medical" before "administration." I have no criticism to offer to General Hines's management of the Veterans' Bureau. I believe General Hines is endeavoring to give justice to the veterans and at the same time represent the interests of the taxpayers. My criticism was directed against the hard-boiled methods of the board of appeals and medical advisers. All of the cases I have appealed to the board of appeals in the last seven years I have never had a reversal of the regional rating board in a single case. It seems to me that the medical mental attitude is too strict. They place too strict a construction on all cases referred to them. Why, even in the dock the prisoner has the benefit of the doubt. It seems to me that in these aggravated cases, where it is necessary for either the Federal Government or a private institution to assist the veteran and his dependents, if there is a doubt the veteran should have the benefit of it.

I have a case in hand in my district where a young man who offered his life for his country, and did his bit overseas, is now totally disabled in a sick ward in the National Military Home in Dayton, Ohio, and his family is dependent upon county help in one of the counties in my district. When this veteran's case was appealed to the board of appeals in Chicago we received an adverse decision. I then asked for a reopening of his case in the Cincinnati regional office. I filed medical testimony from Dr. H. M. Montgomery, Dr. C. B. Finefrock, and Dr. C. J. Yeisley, three of the most prominent and efficient medical authorities in northwestern Ohio, and yet this very day I have had a letter from the regional manager declining to reopen this case. This veteran's wife and children are residing on a farm near Port Clinton, the county seat of Ottawa County. The brave little wife and mother is attempting to keep the family together, while her husband is a totally disabled case and in the Dayton hospital. I consider that while this boy's dependents are a county charge in my district it is a personal reflection upon me. I propose to appeal this case to Washington and fight it to a successful finish, if possible. That will take months. In the meantime how will the family exist? Their only resource is public and private charity. I consider that this is not only a reflection upon me, but upon the Federal Government. I want to thus forcibly call this case, which I suppose is typical of thousands, to your attention and at the same time charge the medical rulings of the Veterans' Bureau in interpreting legislative enactment as being too strict and not friendly enough to the veteran.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the RECORD will be so corrected.

There was no objection.

PENSIONS

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 10159, granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 10159, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. W. T. FITZGERALD, ELLIOTT, BEERS, LOZIER, and UNDERWOOD.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. ASWELL, to preside at the memorial exercises to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] for 15 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

MUSCLE SHOALS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] for 15 minutes.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, there is in Washington now and has been for several days the greatest lobby, representing the greatest and most vicious trust that ever existed in America. They are here by the scores. The lobby that sent the power investigation resolution to the Federal Trade Commission did not compare with the lobby here to-day against the best interests of American farmers.

There is on the calendar—and I will explain why I have asked for this short time—the Muscle Shoals bill, which will be considered on next Wednesday. I did not have an opportunity to make any remarks concerning it on last Wednesday, and I will probably not be given an opportunity to say anything about it next Wednesday.

There is a great hue and cry going up from that lobby that the Government is going into business in competition with private capital and that it is unreasonable, unfair, and undemocratic. I want to tell you, my friends, that the Government is already in business at Muscle Shoals. You voted $120,000,000 there. This great nitrate plant, one of the largest in the world, was built during the war and finished just as the war ended, and when it was finished it was 100 per cent in point of quality and production. Seventeen million dollars had been spent on the foundation of Dam No. 2 on which to build this great dam, and since the change of administration $30,000,000 more has been expended in the completion of that greatest dam and power development anywhere in the world. Since it was completed about two years ago the Government has been there in business operating this power plant.

The Government has been operating it for the benefit of a member of this great Water Power Trust, the Alabama Power Co. That company is taking that power at 2 mills per kilowatt and selling it to me and other people in Alabama for use in our homes for lighting purposes at a rate as high as 10. Of course, they give a better rate for industrial purposes, and where electric ranges are used. Government operation at Muscle Shoals would be nothing new. The Government is now operating the Panama Canal, Shipping Board, United States Fleet Corporation, Mississippi and Warrior River Barge Line, the Post Office Department, arsenals, the ship and navy yards, and parcel post, and is in business in many other ways.

If Congress adjourns without doing anything, the Alabama Power Co. will continue to be the sole beneficiary of this great development.

The fertilizer people say the Government ought not to make fertilizer there. Why? After the war was over the officers of the Government tried to get the fertilizer industry of this country to take over this development. They scorned the idea. The power people would not take any interest in the dam and would not take any steps to complete it. The fertilizer people said:

> We will not have anything to do with the Muscle Shoals nitrate plant. It is of no value. The entire plant there is obsolete.

The country has been flooded for two or three years with propaganda to the effect that the cyanamide process for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen is obsolete. I knew this was not true, but I wanted first-hand information to give you when Congress convened, and I went over into Canada last summer and visited a plant exactly like the one at Muscle Shoals, using the same process. It is not so large and is not as good a plant, but it has been in operation continuously since 1909, doing a good business and paying the stockholders satisfactory dividends.

I have secured information in regard to plants in Germany and other European countries using the same kind of process. They also have plants using the synthetic process, and all the plants in Germany and in the other European countries that were built for war purposes are now being used for the benefit of agriculture, and so successfully that there is no longer any importation of Chilean nitrates into those countries. On the contrary, they have become large exporters of nitrates and fertilizers, and the American farmer to-day is buying fertilizer imported into this country from Germany.

The plant at Muscle Shoals is the only air-nitrogen plant in the United States. There is but one other on the Western Hemisphere, and that is at Niagara Falls, in Canada. The cyanamide plant at Muscle Shoals is the only one anywhere that is not in operation.

There is not a single dollar of private capital invested in the United States in the manufacture of air nitrogen for the benefit of agriculture. The great plant in West Virginia and the great plant under construction at Hopewell, Va., using the synthetic process, are not expected to manufacture one pound of nitrogen that will be used in the manufacture of fertilizer. It will be used for explosives and for other industrial purposes.

A similar plant across from Niagara Falls is making nitrogen and selling some of it to the fertilizer mixers in America for 7 cents a pound—pure nitrogen—and they are paying 20 cents a pound for nitrogen from Chile. They put it all together, mix it up, and sell it to the poor farmer and get as much for the 7-cent cyanamide nitrogen as they do for the 20-cent nitrogen. This is one illustration of how they are treating the farmer.

They say this method is obsolete. Let me tell you what is obsolete and antiquated. It is the method of the fertilizer industry in this country. That great and good man, Milton Whitney, up to a short time ago Director of the Bureau of Soils of the Department of Agriculture, in the hearings on the Ford offer, said that the great trouble with the fertilizer industry in this country is that it is antiquated and out of date. They are nothing but a lot of fertilizer mixers. They buy every pound of nitrogen, every pound of potash, every pound of phosphate, mix it up, and send it to the farmers. They get nearly all of their nitrogen from Chile, and the first payment is $12.53 to the Chilean Government as an export duty. They have to pay the freight rates on this for 6,000 miles, and then what does the farmer get? He gets 16 per cent of nitrogen and 84 per cent of dirt. I can get dirt down in my country for $5 an acre, but under this scheme they are paying the enormous price of $64 a ton for Chilean dirt and passing it on to the farmers. What does this amount to? Eleven million dollars is what the hard-worked and distressed farmers of the Nation are paying to this foreign monopoly.

If this Morin bill brings about competition with anybody, my friends, it will be competition not with private American capital but competition with a foreign monopoly, the Chilean Nitrate Corporation. [Applause.]

These people do not care. It seems the National Fertilizer Association does not care. So long as they can get it imported into this country and pass the cost on to the farmer it is all well and good.

They complain about Muscle Shoals being so far away. Six thousand miles from here is where they are getting it now, but they say it would be terrible for the American farmer to have to pay freight on a little nitrogen from Muscle Shoals, Ala.

Muscle Shoals is as well located as the Government could place it. It is probably nearer the center of that part of the country using the most fertilizer than any other place, and it is also well located from the standpoint of national defense. It is a long way from the Gulf and the Atlantic coasts, and if a foreign enemy should ever undertake to invade this country, Muscle Shoals is well fortified.

In 1916 we enacted a law to build this plant for two fundamental purposes, one to make explosives in time of war and the other to manufacture fertilizer for the benefit of American agriculture in peace times.

What will happen if it stands there idle? If we get into another war 40 or 50 years from now, standing idle or in a stand-by condition, costing the Government $300,000 a year for maintenance, it would be rusted out and obsolete.

The fixation of atmospheric nitrogen is a comparatively new science, and it is one that is being improved on from day to day, and unless you put the plant into operation during peace times it will be of no value for national defense.

Everybody agrees that the Government must keep it, and under the Morin bill we simply provide for the organization of a Government-operated corporation. The President appoints five directors, with the consent and approval of the Senate. They appoint a manager and an assistant manager. They are selected by the President and report to Congress every year, and it will be operated just like a private corporation, except in private corporations the directors are appointed by the stockholders and report to the stockholders. If this bill passes and President Coolidge succeeds in finding five business men qualified to do the job, there is not any reason why it should not be a great success.

If it is not, Congress can discontinue it in a year. If it is a success, everybody will be satisfied. We have been trying for eight years to have private operation. Many bills have been offered here. We passed the Henry Ford bill through the House for private operation. All offers for private operation have been rejected. It is now Government or nothing.

Let me remind you that this same fertilizer lobby was here lobbying against the Henry Ford offer. That was for private operation. So you see it is competition they are opposed to and it makes no difference whether it is Government operation or private operation. They do not want anybody to go into the fertilizer business at Muscle Shoals. They are afraid they will make a better grade of fertilizer and that it will reduce their prices.

Why are they so concerned about Government operation? If these fertilizer companies were taking any interest in building nitrate plants in the United States to relieve the distressed farmers of the country of the burden of the foreign Chilean monopoly there would be less justification for the Government operating the plant. So long as they take no steps to get for the farmer a better and cheaper grade of fertilizer we are justified in operating our own plant. Congress said in 1916 that this was for the purpose of making fertilizer in peace time, and we are only doing just what Congress directed in 1916 should be done.

Now this fertilizer lobby is making a great plea for the poor farmer who can not pay cash for his fertilizer. You all remember the way they sell fertilizer to the farmer who can not pay cash. They charge him about $8 a ton more on time between planting and gathering the crop and 8 per cent interest in addition. Now they come and make a great appeal for the poor farmer that can not pay cash. They complain because the Government proposes to give away 5 per cent of the product for experimental purposes. They do not think that is right.

You see this fertilizer lobby hanging around here. There were so many in the gallery the other day they called it the fertilizer gallery. [Laughter.] They were here in crowds; and Charles J. Brand, the leader of it, was formerly a director of the bureau of markets in the Department of Agriculture, and it is said they had to abolish that department to get rid of him. That was one of the most valuable bureaus we had in the department.

When the roll was called the other day and it was decided to adjourn and give them another week's time for the lobby to work against the bill, this fertilizer crowd all scattered and clapped their hands and Brand jumped up and said, "Come on, boys, meet me at 283, the Mayflower Hotel." It is said they have almost a whole floor there, at that magnificent and expensive hotel, although they say they are losing money. The enormous expense of this lobby will no doubt be passed on to the poor farmer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for 15 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, there are three bills to be voted on next Wednesday afternoon. I think we have plenty of votes to pass the Morin bill if the friends of the farmer will come here and remain and stay on the job until the last roll is called. I have been voting for farm relief ever since I have been a Member of this House. I voted for the McNary-Haugen bill in 1924 and again in 1926 and again in 1928. I voted for the irrigation projects. Your arid lands needed water. Almost every section of the country is now needing and buying fertilizer and is calling for a better grade and cheaper fertilizer in order to replenish the soil.

You all ought to be interested in this, because agriculture is the basic industry of this country. When that prospers all the people prosper. When that suffers the whole citizenry suffers with it. The Norris bill passed the Senate providing for Government operations through the Department of Agriculture, carrying $10,000,000. The idea of turning a great industrial plant like this over to a Government bureau. That bureau changes every four years, and sometimes the Secretary of Agriculture has been changed oftener than once in four years.

There is another bill, the Morin bill, providing a real Government operating corporation. After that bill had been reported a few days ago our good friend Mr. SNELL, from New York, chairman of the Rules Committee, now in the chair, put in a bill providing for Government operation by the same bureau and for experimentation. Air nitrogen has long since passed the experimental stage.

I do not know who wrote my friend SNELL's bill. Of course, as the chairman of the Committee on Rules he has not the time to write such a bill as that. It takes an expert. If Tom Martin, the president of the Alabama Power Co., or some other power company attorney, did not send it to Mr. SNELL, then I have made a very poor guess. There is not a pound of fertilizer in it. If my friend Mr. SNELL's bill ever passes, there will not be a pound of fertilizer made, and the $47,000,000 of the people's money that went into that dam and the power house will go into the hands of the Alabama Power Co. for all time, and they will continue to put these prices on the people. They have not reduced the prices on power one penny since they began buying power at 2 mills per kilowatt from the Government at Muscle Shoals. I live within 5 miles of that dam, and I pay as much for power as anybody down in Mobile, or anywhere else in that section of the country.

I do not know whether we get that power. It goes into the system. They tell the Public Utilities Commission of Alabama that they can not reduce their rates by reason of getting this power at 2 mills per kilowatt-hour, and if this Congress adjourns without passing some legislation, they will continue to reap the benefits of it. They take only a small part of the capacity of the plant and the balance runs to waste.

I am very fond of my friend SNELL. He came down to Muscle Shoals at my invitation. I told the folks down there what a great and good man he was, and what a power he had in the House. They all got interested. I had my colleague Mr. BANKHEAD to come up to meet his chairman of the Rules Committee. We met Mr. SNELL at the depot of my home, Tuscumbia, with a brass band and gave him a great banquet. We also gave him an old-fashioned southern barbecue, and he said that he was entertained with hospitality that no other people could extend like the southern people. He made a speech. I introduced him, of course. I told what a great man he was, and what a power he was in the House. I told them that he could come up here and do anything that he wanted to about Muscle Shoals. Mr. BANKHEAD indorsed all I said about Mr. SNELL and added some. [Laughter.] He made a great speech. He, of course, told my friends and neighbors what an able and influential Congressman they had. [Applause.] He made a real agricultural speech, a farmers' speech, and I believe my friend is interested in the farmer. He made a great speech to this effect: "Now, this thing has been dragging along too long. If I had known how it was going, I would have come down here earlier. It is a shame and a disgrace. It is a reflection on Congress that this plant is not put into operation and that that power is not sold for what it is worth."

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Could the gentleman tell us what else Mr. SNELL said?

Mr. ALMON. He said, "I am in favor of private operation of this plant. I think the Government ought to lease it, and if we can not get a satisfactory lease, then I am in favor of Government operation." [Applause.] I reminded him of that when this Morin bill came up, but he said, "Oh, I meant the right kind of Government operation." [Laughter.] The question is whether this bill is right or whether his bill is right.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is the Snell bill a fertilizer bill?

Mr. ALMON. No; it is a water power bill, pure and simple. There is not an ounce of fertilizer in this bill. The bill under consideration was sent here by a Committee of Twenty-one, headed by my friend Mr. MORIN, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the great Committee on Military Affairs. Let me read the names of the members on that committee: There is Mr. MORIN, of Pennsylvania, who is the chairman; there is Mr. FRANK JAMES, of Michigan; Mr. WURZBACH, of Texas; Mr. REECE, of Tennessee; Mr. SPEAKS, of Ohio; Mr. WAINWRIGHT, of New York; Mr. FURLOW, of Minnesota; Mr. JOHNSON, of Illinois; Mr. HUGHES, of West Virginia; Mr. HOFFMAN, of New Jersey; Mr. QUIN, of Mississippi; Mr. FISHER, of Tennessee; Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia; Mr. GARRETT, of Texas; Mr. MCSWAIN, of South Carolina; Mr. BOYLAN, of New York; Mr. HILL, of Alabama; and Mr. CHAPMAN, of Kentucky—18 of the good and strong men of the House. The most of these 18 members who wrote this bill have given this subject 8 years of faithful and efficient study. Colleagues, stand by your committee. [Applause.] They have turned down all of these private bills on the grounds that they did not protect the interests of the Government. I want all of you gentlemen to be here on next Wednesday afternoon and stay here and pass this bill. [Applause.]

I see from the propaganda that is being resorted to by the opposition of this measure that the bill does not have the approval of the representatives of certain farm organizations. That may be true, but it does not mean that if the farmers themselves had an opportunity to know just what this bill means they would not indorse it almost unanimously. The legislative representatives of the farm organizations opposing this bill do not represent the views and best interest of the farmers themselves. Some of these representatives say they are opposed to Government operation. I did not favor Government operation of Muscle Shoals until I found it was that or nothing. What does the farmer care whether his fertilizer is made by the Government or a private corporation provided he gets it cheaper and a better grade or quality in a concentrated form, and saves millions of dollars in freight rates on fertilizer containing only about 12 per cent plant food. This bill simply means that the Government is to make fertilizer at Muscle Shoals and sell it direct to the farmers and farm organizations at actual cost of production, and without interest on the Government investment for the first five years, and then only 4 per cent per annum on money hereafter paid in as capital stock.

Chile nitrate costs $47 per ton. Same amount of nitrate in cyanamide can be produced at Muscle Shoals for $23.56, with power that Government is now selling Alabama Power Co. for $3.35.

I wonder how any Member of this House, especially one representing an agricultural district, could defend his vote against this bill. I would dislike very much to undertake to defend such a vote before a constituency of intelligent farmers such as I represent, and such as my colleagues from agricultural districts represent. We owe it to ourselves, to the Government, and to the farmers of America to pass this bill.

This same power and fertilizer lobby was here six years ago opposing the Ford bill which provided for private operation at Muscle Shoals. Examine the hearings on the Ford bill and your letter files, of you who were here at that time, and you will find that they were making the same claims. That is that Ford would put them out of business. The power monopoly feared Ford as a competitor. They knew that he would demonstrate to the public that the people were paying extortionate and unreasonable prices for power. The Fertilizer Trust did not want Ford as a competitor in the fertilizer business. They knew that he would reduce the price of fertilizer and make a better grade. So it is not Government operation but competition that they fear and oppose. [Applause.]

Mr. Charles J. Brand, secretary-treasurer National Fertilizer Association, has flooded the Members of Congress with publications for the past 30 days. One of his complaints is that under the Morin bill fertilizer is to be sold for cash, and that would inure to the detriment of the poor man who can not pay cash. They charge the man who buys on time about 15 per cent more than for cash, and 8 per cent interest additional. No doubt many farmers who buy on credit now would be able to pay cash if they could get the fertilizer for about one-third less than existing prices. As a further evidence of their interest in the farmer they object to that part of the bill which authorizes the Government to donate to the farmers 5 per cent of the products of the plant for experimental purposes. I wonder if they object to what the Government is doing in the way of furnishing farmers information through agricultural yearbooks, farmers' bulletins, and assistance rendered through the Bureau of Animal Industry in teaching farmers how to treat their livestock and improve the breeds. Is it not just as important to teach the farmers in regard to the best kind of fertilizer to be used and how to apply it? [Applause.]

Do not let anyone be frightened by this talk that the Morin bill will put anyone out of business.

The express company claimed that parcel post would put them out of business. Parcel post has been a great success and saved the people millions of dollars. The express company is still in business and their stock has advanced in price.

The powder interest claimed that they would be put out of business if the Government made powder. The Government proceeded to make powder, and the powder people are still in business; but the price has been reduced. The enactment of this bill into law may, and I hope it will, cause the fertilizer industry to modernize their antiquated methods of producing fertilizer.

The fertilizer mixers buy all the cyanamide nitrogen they can get for 7 cents a pound and use it along with Chilean nitrogen, which costs 20 cents per pound, and sell it at the same price. That is another reason why the Government corporation should be authorized to make complete fertilizer, as the fertilizer industry might not buy and use the Government nitrogen, and if they did the Government might not be able to protect the farmer in the price of Government nitrogen put into the mixed fertilizer.

The farmers are becoming more scientific in their methods of farming and are just beginning to realize the advantages of a better and concentrated fertilizer and are going to demand it. If Government operation of Muscle Shoals is a success it should and will be continued, and no one will favor private operation. If it is not a success it will be discontinued and the way will be opened for a lease and private operation, but no lease will be made by Congress unless this should happen.

The fertility of the soil is being rapidly exhausted in every part of the country and it will not be long until it will have to be replenished by fertilizer and you all should be taking an interest in this subject.

The Morin bill is a real fertilizer bill. That accounts for the presence of the lobby that is here working against this bill and who admit that it is a fertilizer bill and set up the claim that it will injure their business by reducing prices of fertilizer to the farmers. The farmers are not able to come here. They must depend on us as their representatives to protect their interest. Some of their legislative representatives are here opposing this bill and in doing so they do not represent but misrepresent the wishes and the best interests of the farmers back at home who are paying their salaries and expenses. [Applause.] While some of them claim that there is no fertilizer in this bill, still in opposing it they place themselves in the ranks of the fertilizer lobby which is here trying to defeat this bill. Those who are opposed to this bill are on the side of and aiding the power and fertilizer lobbies. What will farmers think of their representatives here? Let us stand firm and loyal to the best interest of the farmers. Let the friends and supporters of this bill remain in the House—stand together and vote together and we will win a victory for agriculture. [Applause.]

PERSONAL PHYSICIAN TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 192, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 192

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union S. 3456, allowing the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army, to the medical officer assigned to duty as personal physician to the President.

At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes Senate 3456 in order. By the terms of the rule, the bill is to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The bill is exceedingly short. It simply gives the rank, pay, and allowance of a colonel to the officer, a major in the Medical Corps, now detailed as the personal physician to the President. The bill does not permit the continuance of the rank or pay or allowance after this officer is relieved from duty on his present detail. The report from the Committee on Rules is unanimous. No time has been asked on the rule. Therefore I move the previous question on the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 3456, allowing the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army, to the medical officer assigned to duty as personal physician to the President, which I ask the Clerk to report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the officer of the Medical Corps, United States Army, who is now assigned to duty as the personal physician to the President shall have the temporary rank and the pay and allowances of a colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army, while so serving.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 7, after the word "serving," insert a colon and the words "Provided, That the officer now assigned to that duty shall have the rank, pay, and allowances herein provided from the date of his assignment."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the resolution just adopted, the bill will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk again read the bill and the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

PINK BOLLWORM

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Resolution 193.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 193

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. J. Res. 129, to provide for eradication of pink bollworm and authorizing an appropriation therefor. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order the consideration of the Senate Joint Resolution 129, authorizing an appropriation of $5,000,000 to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture for the eradication of the pink bollworm.

The pink bollworm is probably the most deadly pest that infests cotton. The only successful way in which it can be combated is by its complete eradication by the creation of noncotton zones in which cotton is not permitted to be grown.

In 1918 this pest first appeared in the United States in a section of Louisiana, and also to some extent in the State of Texas. It was recognized that it was a great menace to the cotton industry of the country; that if it were allowed to spread, it in time would infest the whole cotton area.

Experience with the pest in other countries, like Egypt, where it had been permitted to spread, was that it had damaged the cotton crop from 25 to 30 per cent.

So steps were immediately taken by the people interested to handle this menace. At first it was undertaken in the State of Texas by voluntary agreement between the farmers in the infected area to have noncotton areas. In 1918 that plan operated rather successfully, where more than 90 per cent of the farmers in the infected area omitted to plant cotton and combated the pest by the noncotton-zone regulation. But a small percentage of the farmers, as it always the case where you try to have voluntary action of this kind, refused to go through with the program, and while very fine results were obtained, yet there was not complete eradication in that district.

So by legislation the State of Texas provided for the creation of noncotton zones where the farmers were prohibited from planting cotton in the infested area, and by an act of Congress subsequently passed an appropriation was made by the Federal Government wherein the United States contributed toward the payment of damages to these farmers who, by reason of being deprived of the right to plant cotton, suffered financial loss. Representatives of the Department of Agriculture stated before our Committee on Agriculture at the hearings that the pest was completely eradicated in two seasons in the State of Texas and the State of Louisiana.

During the past year this pest manifested itself again in about seven counties of western Texas and in a small area in Arizona. It is known that it was brought into this country in some way from the Republic of Mexico. The area infested—in some spots to a greater extent than in others—comprised more than 400,000 acres in the western part of Texas and over in Arizona.

The Committee on Agriculture has reported this resolution. It has already passed the Senate. It authorizes, as I said, an expenditure of $5,000,000 under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture to put on a campaign to completely eradicate this pest for this season of 1928.

Heretofore the States contributed under the law, I think, 33⅓ per cent; I think that was the quota of the States. But conditions this year make it an absolute physical impossibility for the State of Texas, where the larger area of infestation is located, to procure the funds to cooperate with the Federal Government. The Legislature of Texas is not now in session, and if it were in session and made an appropriation, there are no funds available. It would require, it is stated to the committee, a spread of assessments to bring in the necessary funds.

A great emergency faces the Congress and the whole cotton industry of America, and the Committee on Agriculture of the House, following the action taken by the Senate, concluded that the situation warranted the Federal Government for the year 1928 in furnishing the funds necessary to carry on this campaign of eradication.

Every section of the country is interested in the eradication of this pest, because if it is not eradicated—and experience has demonstrated that it can be completely eradicated by this method and this method only—it will pervade a large area, and we shall ultimately be called upon to spend millions and millions of dollars to control it, whereas a small amount expended at this time will, it is believed, completely eradicate the pest.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. COLTON. It seems apparent that if it is coming from Mexico we shall probably have a recurring epidemic of infestation. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if any steps are being taken in the Republic of Mexico to eradicate the pest.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. No steps have been taken yet that are adequate.

Mr. COLTON. It might be a continuing appropriation.

Mr. FULMER. I may state that the experts who appeared before the committee have stated that they have had that question up and have been very successful in trying to keep down the pest.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I understand the resolution has passed the Senate and has a unanimous report from the Committee on Agriculture. I also understand the President and the Budget favor it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Yes. The Department of Agriculture also favors it and the Budget.

Mr. ABERNETHY. It looks as if we could put it through without much trouble.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. We are going to.

The point has been raised in opposition to the resolution that it ought not to be passed unless the States of Texas and Arizona are required to contribute toward the eradication of the pest.

Mr. ABERNETHY. It is a national question, is it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I think it is.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. My recollection is that the testimony brought out the fact that up until now the State of Texas has paid about 96 per cent of all the money that has been spent in the eradication of this pest.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I believe that is true.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield on that very point?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am sure, touching the ability of the State of Texas to meet this assessment, that this little statement from the hearings will be of interest to the House. This statement is from the State secretary of agriculture:

As you understand, the amount of money to be raised by ad valorem tax in this State is limited by the constitution, and we are now levying the constitutional limit for school purposes and for pensions, but we have not quite reached the limit for general revenue purposes. However, the constantly increasing demands of the departments of government and different institutions for more appropriations will probably cause a raising of the ad valorem tax the coming year, and the State could not possibly raise, under our constitution, the amount of funds necessary to pay for establishment and maintenance of noncotton zones in the 15 counties of Texas now infested by the pink bollworm.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. As I stated, it is manifestly impossible for the State of Texas at this time to raise funds with which to cooperate with the Government in this campaign. Without taking any more of the time of the House I will simply say that after a most careful investigation the Committee on Agriculture of the House, of which I have the honor to be a member, unanimously reported this resolution. It is urgent and it ought to command the support of every Member on this floor without regard to what section of the country he comes from, because, after all, the welfare of any section of this country is the welfare of us all. [Applause.]

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Do not the hearings also show that the State of Louisiana paid, my recollection is, anywhere from 60 to 75 per cent of the cost there?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Absolutely. I will say further that the resolution provides that this is merely for this year. After 1928 if any program is put on in the succeeding years the States infested will be required to pay 50 per cent of the cost.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, 40 years ago nobody supposed that the boll weevil would destroy cotton crops as far north as the State which in part I represent, North Carolina, yet during the last few years the destruction of cotton by the boll weevil has been simply immense, in some instances the crop being almost totally destroyed. Now, here is another pest that has come from across the Rio Grande River, and by prompt action there appears to be no doubt about the fact that the pest can be stamped out. This appropriation is for that purpose.

The difference between the boll weevil and the pink bollworm is, as I understand it, that the boll weevil destroys a part of the crop, sometimes 75 per cent of it, but the pink bollworm, in instances, destroys the entire crop.

I think there is no more to be said, Mr. Speaker.

This appropriation, it is said, will do the job and it provides for noncotton zones in order to prevent the further migration of this pest over the cotton area of America.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. Does it attack the boll before it makes the lint or later?

Mr. POU. I can not answer that. Mr. Speaker, I yield, with the permission of my friend from Illinois, the remainder of my time to my colleague from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall consume but a moment on this proposition. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] have very succinctly, and I think completely, represented the emergency involved in this proposition.

What I desire to say—and when I say that I shall conclude, because I think the House is ready to vote on this proposition without much debate—has reference to the very gratifying spirit of cooperation that is always manifested by this House and its membership when a question of this character comes up. Here is a proposition which our friends from all sections of the country other than the South have recognized as a menace and as a real and actual menace to our entire cotton situation in all of the Southern States, and although it does involve the question of the Federal Government making a substantial appropriation apparently for the benefit of the citizens of one or two States, when it was shown to the committee by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] and others that the great State of Texas, however anxious she might be to contribute her just part toward the eradication of this great pest, was, on account of constitutional and other limitations, unable to do so, the committee gladly yielded that point and are heartily cooperating in the passage of this bill. That same spirit was shown with reference to the proposal last year for the eradication of the corn borer, a pest that threatened, and still threatens, the great corn industry of all sections of the country. It was gratifying then as it is now to see upon the part of all Members of this House, regardless of party or section, a fine spirit of cooperation. That shows that when an emergency of this sort is presented, regardless of technical considerations of policy, of constitutional limitations, or otherwise, the Members here are willing to meet the issue and to make adequate provision to meet the emergency.

I hope there will be no objection to the bill in any particular and that we can soon vote unanimously in favor of its passage. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN].

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS], who presented this rule, fully covered the case. I want to join in the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] with reference to the manner in which this resolution has been received by the House.

I want to say further, gentlemen of the House, I feel that this Congress, if it is not following precedent and is making a new one, is fully justified in doing so by passing this resolution. I believe it will be economy for the Government at this time to pass the resolution and let the appropriation be made, because the pink bollworm is different from the boll weevil and the corn borer in that the pink bollworm can be eradicated.

In 1919 an area in the district that I now represent was infested by the pink bollworm and the Department of Agriculture, in connection with the people of Louisiana, created a noncotton zone and within three years the pink bollworm was entirely eradicated.

If the pink bollworm is not eradicated it will no doubt in a few years infest the whole cotton area and when it does this Government will be called on to regulate it, and its regulation will cost many times what it will cost now to eradicate it.

I think the entire country appreciates the work done for this resolution by the introducer of it, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. BUCHANAN, because it is almost entirely due to his energy that this resolution is now before the House and will soon pass, as I believe.

On behalf of my people I want to thank the Committee on Agriculture and its members from all sections of the country, and the Rules Committee, which is presided over by the present acting Speaker.

I think the resolution should pass. I believe it will be economical for the Government for it to pass at this time and I certainly hope it will do so.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, the pink bollworm has not made its appearance in my State, but the people of Mississippi are just as vitally interested in its eradication as the people of that small part of Texas where the pest is now doing so much damage. The pink bollworm is a more deadly foe to cotton than the boll weevil and its ravages are much more extensive. It exists in every country of the world where cotton is raised, and has only recently invaded a small section of ours, coming to us across the border from Mexico. It is transmitted from one territory to another in cottonseed. Where it exists eggs are laid or deposited in the seed and when the seed are planted the eggs are hatched, and in this way the new seed are similarily infected and in a few years the pest is spread everywhere cotton is grown.

The Agricultural Department has conducted extensive experiments with this insect and knows how to get rid of it. This is agreed. It behooves us, therefore, to immediately apply the remedy. The cost of doing this now will be relatively small. It is the duty of the Government to do it. The States can not. All sections of our country are interested in cotton and hence can not afford to let our largest agricultural activity be destroyed.

The lot of the farmer is bad enough at best. Efforts to relieve his conditions economically are pending now before the Congress. I have given these measures my loyal support and will continue to do so. It is to our country's welfare that its rural population shall have the same opportunities for health, wealth, culture, and happiness that goes to those citizens in other vocations.

The measure now pending has no political aspects. It has no economic angles or cross sections. It is meritorious. It demands the support of every Member of this House, and I am sure will receive it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 129) to provide for eradication of the pink bollworm and authorizing an appropriation therefor.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution S. J. Res. 129, with Mr. MICHENER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, the first reading of the resolution was dispensed with.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I will take the full five minutes which has been yielded me; but I have here a statement from Dr. W. E. Hinds, who is the entomologist of the Louisiana Experiment Station, and I think one of the ablest men in his line that there is in this country.

In a statement he sent to all Members of Congress on April 14, entitled "Congress should wake up," he makes two or three very illuminating statements about this problem that does confront the cotton-growing industry. First he says:

> To accomplish extermination of the pink bollworm in the present known infested areas in the United States will constitute a tremendous undertaking, but it is positively the only method by which the spread of this pest through the entire Cotton Belt can be prevented. The success of earlier extermination work indicates that it is possible to do as well again. The magnitude of the undertaking should not be discourage but rather make more certain the adequate effort that is required.

Now, it was brought out in the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture that the complete extermination by noncotton zones of the pink bollworm was perhaps the only instance on record where an insect of this kind had been completely eradicated and was an excellent illustration of the method that the Department of Agriculture should follow in cases of this kind wherever it is practicable. Doctor Hinds in his statement also lays special stress on the fact that it is a national problem. On this point he says:

> The eradication of the pink bollworm must be considered as a national problem. It must be undertaken without delay if it is ever accomplished successfully. The protection of the vast cotton-producing and cotton-manufacturing industries of the United States justifies fully any needed national or State appropriations for such work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of what this eminent authority says, I felt justified in asking for a moment's time to read it to the House.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes; I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What are the statutes of the State of Texas relating to the noncotton zones?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. They provide that the pink bollworm commission is authorized to declare noncotton zones and, of course, the statute provides that the grower shall be compensated, because, naturally, you could not exercise that power unless you did provide for compensation.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is that without consideration of what he may receive in the way of other crops?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The language of the statute is "the actual and necessary damage," and of course that would take into consideration any crops he may be able to grow by way of reducing the damage. I am glad that the House seems to be unanimous for the passage of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa advise the Chair whether an agreement for the control of time was made in the House?

Mr. HAUGEN. The rule provides for one hour's debate, but there was no agreement as to control of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize anyone opposed to the bill.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am only asking this time so as to give my hearty indorsement to this very meritorious bill.

The bill has the strongest kind of indorsement by the Department of Agriculture, largely backed on past experience in dealing with this pest, the pink bollworm. About two years ago we had one section in Louisiana and about two counties in Texas infested, and the Department of Agriculture put on the methods contemplated under this bill; that is, the enforcement of noncotton zone, and completely stamped out this worm. The Budget commission has also given its O. K. on the appropriation carried in this legislation.

I could very easily oppose this bill from a selfish viewpoint, believing that if the pink bollworm were undisturbed it would eat up the farmers' cotton in Texas, thereby cutting the total yield annually in such a manner that perhaps my people would receive a better price for their cotton. This might work temporarily, but I am too well acquainted with the ravages of the boll weevil to take such a stand.

My people of South Carolina are very much interested and concerned in the extermination of the pink bollworm, because they believe that unless the Government will take the step contemplated under this bill it will only be a short time until the pink bollworm will be all over the cotton South just like the boll weevil.

I would like to state, also, that I noted just a few days ago that the county convention of Sumter County, my district, passed resolution in behalf of the passage of this kind of legislation. It is my belief that had the Government taken such steps when we first discovered the boll weevil we could have stamped out that most damaging pest. Members of Congress at that time tried to put over this kind of program, but were unsuccessful, and to-day the boll weevil is not only costing the Government millions of dollars annually in trying to keep down this pest, but our cotton farmers are using considerable extra labor and losing millions of dollars because of the destruction of the weevil when seasons are favorable for their dirty work.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE PINK BOLLWORM AS A COTTON PEST

The pink bollworm ranks as perhaps the worst of all known cotton insect pests. It has for the United States a special menace for the reason that we already have the boll weevil, now a source of annual and very heavy losses throughout the Cotton Belt. The weevil is particularly an enemy of the buds or squares, while the pink bollworm attacks, in preference, the bolls, and therefore is competent to destroy any part of the crop that may have escaped the weevil. Having both of these pests would place the United States under a very serious handicap in competition with other cotton-producing countries of the world.

The pink bollworm is a native of India. It was first recognized there as a cotton pest in 1842, but its early record was not exploited and was apparently thereafter overlooked. About 1906 or 1907 this pest was introduced from India into Egypt through the agency of seed cotton sent to Egypt for ginning. The parent insect is a small moth related to the codling moth of the apple. Its larva attacks particularly the seed and remains in the seed over winter, and it is this fact that has led to the rather rapid progress of this cotton pest around the world in shipments of seed.

In Egypt it spread rapidly after its introduction into lower Egypt and now covers practically all of the Nile Valley. Its economic status there is indicated in a publication of this year issued by the Egyptian ministry of agriculture. In a brief summary of cotton pests in this publication the following statement is made relative to this insect:

> The pink bollworm (Gelechia gossypiella) is by far the greatest known pest in Egypt, as much as one-quarter of the crop being rendered unpickable annually through its ravages. Appearing in small numbers in June, it increases at a rapid rate until 90 per cent or more of the unopened bolls on the plant toward the end of the season are damaged by it.

It should be noted that this damage is in spite of enforced application of all known remedies against the pest, including the removal of all cotton plants from the field early in the fall, the burning of all parts of the plant which contain the insect, and the disinfection of all planting seed.

This pest reached Brazil (1911–1913) through the agency of purchases of seed in Egypt for distribution by the department of agriculture of that country, leading to a very prompt and general distribution of the pest. The losses from this pest in Brazil are reported by the Minister of Agriculture of that country to have reached, by 1917, from one-third to two-thirds of the crop, involving losses in seven States in that year totaling $27,000,000.

In Hawaii a small but very promising industry has been wiped out by reason of this pink bollworm.

Very heavy losses are also experienced in East Africa, where it became established possibly even before it reached Egypt.

Its present range includes India, Egypt, East Africa, a portion of the West Indies, Mexico, Australia, China, and some other countries. The United States is now the only important cotton-producing country of the world which is substantially free from this pest.

We now know that this pest reached the United States via Mexico. Two importations into Mexico of Egyptian seed were made in 1911 and planted in or near the principal cotton district of that Republic, namely, the Laguna district, some 200 or 300 miles south of our border. The department had been early advised of the occurrence of this pest in Egypt, and in 1913—a year after the passage of the plant quarantine act—had promulgated a quarantine prohibiting the entry of cottonseed from all countries except Mexico. The fact of the entry of this pest into Mexico was learned by the department in 1917, following the transmission in that year of samples of injured bolls for examination and report, and while an immediate stop was placed on the further entry of cottonseed from Mexico it developed in the fall of that year that some of the seed which had previously come over from Mexico had resulted in an initial establishment of this pest at Hearne, Tex. Later on, in the same year, it was discovered that the pest had a very considerable foothold in the Trinity Bay region. I gathered from the hearings before our committee on this bill that this much more widespread infestation resulted from a large shipment of Mexican cotton lint which was landed at Galveston for transshipment to Europe. During the period that it was held at Galveston, the big hurricane or storm of 1915 took large quantities of this baled cotton and broke the bales and scattered the lint along the coast of Texas, and particularly along the shores of Trinity Bay, which opens into the Gulf near that point. A good deal of seed remains in ginned cotton, and it was evidently from this cottonseed so distributed that the infestation gained a large foothold in that part of the State.

This situation led to an immediate effort, under a Federal appropriation, to effect the eradication of the pest in these areas in eastern Texas. The main area in southeastern Texas about Trinity Bay was about equivalent to the area of the State of Connecticut, and a similar area was later found in Louisiana opposite the area in Texas. There also later developed three additional points of spread, one near Shreveport, La., and two others, one in Ellis and one in Grayson Counties in northern Texas. The two large areas and also the smaller areas, including the one at Hearne, were all placed under noncotton zones, with the intention of endeavoring to eradicate and eliminate the pest. The growth of cotton was forbidden in these areas and over a sufficient border strip to give greater security. These noncotton zones were maintained for 1, 2, and, in some cases, 3 years, and in each instance the effort was successful, inasmuch as for some 7 years no recurrence of the pest has been determined in any of these areas which, in the meantime, have been kept under yearly inspection. We have, therefore, a series of demonstrations that clean-up and noncotton zones for one or two years are efficient means of eradication.

The CHAIRMAN. If no one demands recognition, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. NEWTON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MICHENER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 129 and had directed him to report the same back without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is ordered, and the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the preamble will be stricken out. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, if the preamble is stricken out would it not have to go back to conference? It is really important that there should be no delay, and I hope the House will not strike the preamble out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair that would be such a change in the bill as to require the bill to go back to conference.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, was a motion made to strike out the preamble?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the Chair stated that without objection it would be stricken out. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I object.

Mr. FORT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FORT. The bill as printed (S. J. Res. 129) contains two committee amendments, which were read by the Clerk. Are those amendments adopted in the form the report was made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has the wrong print. Those were committee amendments to the Senate bill and are in the bill as it passed the Senate. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Under the unanimous-consent order, the Clerk will call the Consent Calendar, beginning where we left off last time the calendar was called.

TULE RIVER INDIAN RESERVATION, CALIF.

The first business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1662) to change the boundaries of the Tule River Indian Reservation, Calif.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I have no intention of objecting—I ask the gentleman from California who is in charge of the bill what the reason is for the change?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the reason for the change is the fact that certain private lands inadvertently were included within the boundaries of the reservation when the survey was made, and certain Indian lands that were intended to be placed in the reservation were left out. It is a matter purely of correction.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the boundaries of the Tule River Indian Reservation, Calif., created by Executive order dated January 9, 1873, are hereby changed so as to exclude from said reservation the following tracts of land, which were shown by the plat of survey approved on the 2d day of February, 1884, to be a part of the public domain, and were duly patented or granted by the United States as such, but were shown by the plat of resurvey approved on the 12th day of March, 1927, to be within the outer boundaries of the said Indian reservation, to wit: Southwest quarter southwest quarter section 7; all sections 16 and 17; east half northeast quarter, southwest quarter northeast quarter, southeast quarter northwest quarter, east half southeast quarter section 18; east half northwest quarter, northwest quarter northwest quarter, northeast quarter section 20; northwest quarter northwest quarter section 21; and tract No. 48 in the southeast quarter section 28, all in township 21 south, range 31 east, of the Mount Diablo meridian in California.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NEW YORK STATE CAMP FOR VETERANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7464) to authorize the Secretary of War to accept conveyance of the cemetery at the New York State Camp for Veterans to the United States, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. LaGUARDIA (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we may return to this number on the calendar which the Clerk is now reading. I am trying to get my papers in shape. I ask to have the bill go over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will go over for a few moments.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the next bill.

PURCHASE OF LAND AT WINNEMUCCA, NEV.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 2084) for the purchase of land in the vicinity of Winnemucca, Nev., for an Indian colony, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] asked me to have certain amendments inserted in the bill, which I shall move at the end of the reading of the bill. I desire to give notice of that fact now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $500, for the purchase of land in the vicinity of Winnemucca, Nev., described as the north half of the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 29, township 36 north, range 38 east, Mount Diablo meridian, containing 20 acres, more or less, to be used as an Indian colony.

SEC. 2. That there is also authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $2,000 for moving the cabins of Indians residing in the vicinity of Winnemucca, Nev., to the above-described location, for making necessary repairs to said cabins, building roads in colony, and for erecting such new cabins as, in the opinion of the United States Office of Indian Affairs, may be necessary.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I offer to amend, on page 2, line 6, by striking out the word "such."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOOPER: Page 2, line 6, strike out the word "such."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I also offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOOPER: Page 2, line 7, after the word "cabins," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The message also announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

CONSENT CALENDAR

EXCHANGING LANDS IN YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12038) to authorize the acquisition of certain patented lands adjoining the Yosemite National Park boundary by exchange, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what lands are going to be exchanged?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. These lands to be exchanged are lands that are very fine feeding lands for deer that are in the park. Lands of less value will be exchanged for these grazing lands. That is, an equal area of land situated in another part of the reservation of the park which are not grazing lands will be exchanged for these lands. It is a matter of game protection, purely, and is approved by the department. It is very desirable from a nature standpoint.

Mr. SCHAFER. And the gentleman says that the lands that the Government is going to receive are more valuable than the lands which the Government is giving in exchange?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Yes; from a game-conservation standpoint.

Mr. SCHAFER. I refer to a monetary standpoint. I do not want the Government to come out at the short end of the horn and give away some lands whose actual value is more than the value of lands it receives.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. The lands are of the same character, but the lands the Government will receive are of more value as they contain some timber. The matter was carefully looked into by the department and by the committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If they want to add to the national park, why not buy the desirable land?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. This is not an addition. It is an exchange of lands within the area of the park. Lands that the park desires are exchanged for lands owned by private parties.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have never heard of an exchange of lands where the Government does not give absolutely good land for land that is no good.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. This is a mutual agreement between the landowner and the park people to protect the game. This land is a game reservation which happens to be in private ownership.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows that it will do all that?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. The committee investigated it very carefully, and the department also.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of protecting park deer along the western boundary of the Yosemite National Park, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire as part of said park, by exchange as hereinafter provided, title in fee for and on behalf of the United States of America to all that land in sections 21 and 28 in township 3 south, range 20 east, Mount Diablo meridian, lying between the abandoned railroad grade running from a point in the Wawona Road near Chinquapin to the top of the abandoned incline hoist in the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 21, and the east and west center line of section 21, and in sections 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27 lying between said abandoned railroad grade and the existing park boundary, containing 1,350 acres, more or less, now held in private ownership, which lands upon acquisition shall be, and are hereby, added to the park; and in exchange therefor the said Secretary be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue patent to the owner of said lands, for the Government lands described as follows: That part of the north half of northeast quarter lying south of abandoned railroad grade hereinbefore mentioned, north half of southwest quarter of northeast quarter, southwest quarter of southwest quarter of northeast quarter, southwest quarter, west half of northeast quarter of southeast quarter, and southwest quarter of southeast quarter of section 25, township 3 south, range 20 east; north half section 36, township 3 south, range 20 east; southwest quarter northeast quarter, south half northeast quarter northwest quarter, west half northwest quarter, southeast quarter northwest quarter, northeast quarter southeast quarter, and west half southwest quarter southeast quarter section 32, township 3 south, range 21 east; and northwest quarter section 5, township 4 south, range 21 east; containing 1,010 acres, more or less, which lands upon issuance of patent shall be, and are hereby, eliminated from said park.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 23, strike out the word "northeast" and insert in lieu thereof the word "northwest."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

HEADSTONES OVER GRAVES OF CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10304) authorizing the Secretary of War to erect headstones over the graves of soldiers who served in the Confederate Army and to direct him to preserve in the records of the War Department the names and places of burial of all soldiers for whom such headstones shall have been erected, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I will state to the gentleman that I do not intend to object—may I ask the gentleman if he has any information as to approximately the number of graves that will be affected by this legislation?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I took up that matter with the Quartermaster General of the Army. I may say that he approves of the purpose of the bill.

Mr. HOOPER. I approve of the purposes of the legislation.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. But I can not give the gentleman definite information.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In order to avoid experiences such as we have had heretofore, would the gentleman from Alabama object to an amendment on page 1, line 8, after the word "durable," to insert the word "domestic"?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I have no objection to that; none whatever. I will offer that as an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CONNERY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker—and I shall not object—I am happy to see this bill pass. In the World War we had the sons of Confederate soldiers fighting in France with us, and I am sure all patriotic citizens would be glad to see the proper reverence paid to these Confederate soldiers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

LICENSING OF PATENTS OWNED BY THE UNITED STATES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12695) to authorize the licensing of patents owned by the United States.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

LANDS IN THE NEZ PERCE INDIAN RESERVATION, IDAHO

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11983) to provide for issuance of perpetual easement to the department of fish and game, State of Idaho, to certain lands situated within the original boundaries of the Nez Perce Indian Reservation, State of Idaho.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commencing at a point on the east and west center line of section 14, township 35 north, range 4 west, Boise meridian, 885 feet west of the east quarter corner of said section 14, which point of beginning is also on the easterly right-of-way line of the Camas Prairie Railroad; thence north 3° 10′ west, along said right-of-way line a distance of 1,646 feet; thence east a distance of 1,158.5 feet to a point on the westerly right of way of the county road; thence south 3° 27′ west along said county road right-of-way line a distance of 1,648 feet to a point on the east and west center line of section 13, township 35 north, range 4 west, Boise meridian, which point is 83.6 feet east of the west quarter corner of said section 13; thence north 89° 58′ west, along the east and west center lines of said sections 13 and 14, a distance of 968.6 feet to the point of beginning. Lying partly in the northwest quarter section 13 and partly in the northeast quarter section 14. All in township 35 north, range 4 west, Boise meridian, containing 40.22 acres, more or less.

Said lands to be used by the department of fish and game, State of Idaho, for the propagation of fish and game: Provided, That should the land herein granted cease to be used by the department of fish and game, State of Idaho, for the propagation of fish and game, the easement shall cease, the grantees be permitted to remove structures and equipment that they may have added, and the land described revert to the grantors herein.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "way," insert the word "line."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ACQUISITION OF LANDS NEAR FORT KAMEHAMEHA, HAWAII

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, when the bill (H. R. 11847) to authorize the acquisition of the Queen Emma and Damon estates and the Halawa site in the vicinity of Fort Kamehameha, Hawaii, and for other purposes, was up the other day the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] asked that it go over without prejudice. He is now here, and I ask unanimous consent that we return to that bill, Calendar No. 604.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that we return to the bill No. 604 on the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Michigan has made a personal investigation of this project, and he feels that the completion of it along the line recommended by the committee will in the long run result in a decided economy to the Army and Navy activities in the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. JAMES. Yes. It will save a good many millions of dollars.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

APPROPRIATION FOR ROADS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1145) to authorize an appropriation for roads on Indian reservations.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker—and I have no intention to object—the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] has made a special study of this matter and has asked me to request that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from California for some information. Are the Indians who are involved in this matter going to do the work of the actual fencing of the property?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the Indians who are involved in this matter are going to supply all of the labor. They are simply asking the Government to supply them with the materials. They are one of the few tribes of Indians in the United States, outside of the Civilized Tribes, that are self-supporting. They have a large cattle industry, and this fence is for the purpose of protecting that industry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for expenditure under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the purchase of barbed wire and posts and transportation of the same for use in the construction of a fence on or near the east boundary of the Papago Indian Reservation, Ariz., beginning at the international boundary line and extending in a northerly direction for approximately 60 miles: Provided, That no part of said appropriation shall be expended in payment of labor for the erection of said fence.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the expenses for necessary surveys, classification of lands, and all other expenses in connection with the allotment work.

RURAL POST ROADS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1341) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have this bill passed over without prejudice.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF SOUTH DAKOTA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8551) to create an additional judge in the District of South Dakota.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there a real necessity for an additional judge in South Dakota?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I will state that the State of South Dakota is one judicial district and it has only one judge. This judge is almost at the age when he can retire. The work is very burdensome and this is for the purpose of relieving him and having some one there to assist in doing the work. The judge himself will be able to retire very shortly and this does not create an additional judge. The bill provides that no successor to him shall be appointed without congressional action.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is the docket of the court congested?

Mr. DYER. The docket is very much congested, due to the health of the present judge. As I have stated, South Dakota is one judicial district and South Dakota is becoming a very great State in many industrial ways. It has many important matters that come to the Federal court, and having only one judge there, and his health not being very good, it is really in the interest of the public business to create this additional judge. However, an additional judge will be created for but a few months.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of South Dakota, who shall reside in said district and whose term of office, compensation, duties, and powers shall be the same as now provided by law for the judge of said district.

SEC. 2. When a vacancy shall occur in the office of the existing judge for said district such vacancy shall not be filled unless authorized by the Congress.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect upon its approval by the President.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RURAL POST ROADS

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 655, S. 1341, an act to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the Unied States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes, which was passed over temporarily a moment ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 655. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand from the reading of the bill, it does not disturb the present plan of apportionment to the States of Federal aid?

Mr. COLTON. Not at all.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It leaves that just as it is under the present law?

Mr. COLTON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The only change made is that under certain conditions it permits the Federal Government to use a larger part on some particular road than is now permitted under the general law.

Mr. COLTON. And that is deducted from the amount allotted to each State where this is used.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 4, section 4, of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes," approved June 19, 1922 (42 Stat. L. 660), prescribing limitations on the payments of Federal funds per mile which the Secretary may make, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a further proviso, as follows:

"And provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may make payments in excess of the above limitations per mile in the case of any project involving construction in mountainous, swampy, or flood lands, on which the average cost per mile for the grading and drainage structures other than bridges of more than 20 feet clear span will exceed $10,000 per mile; and also in the case of any project which by reason of density of population or character and volume of traffic the State highway department and the Secretary of Agriculture may determine should be improved with a surface of greater width than 18 feet. In no event shall the payments of Federal funds on any project under this proviso exceed 50 per cent of the cost of the project, except as such payments are authorized to be increased in the public-land States."

SEC. 2. That the paragraph of section 6 of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, which reads as follows: "Not more than 60 per cent of all Federal aid allotted to any State shall be expended upon the primary or interstate highways until provision has been made for the improvement of the entire system of such highways: Provided, That with the approval of any State highway department the Secretary of Agriculture may approve the expenditure of more than 60 per cent of the Federal aid apportioned to such State upon the primary or interstate highways in such State," is hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. That section 11 of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921 (42 Stat. L. 212), as amended or supplemented, be further amended by adding at the end of the second paragraph thereof the following:

"And provided further, That in the case of any State containing unappropriated public lands and nontaxable Indian lands, individual and tribal, exceeding 5 per cent of the total area of all lands in the State in which the population, as shown by the latest available Federal census, does not exceed 10 per square mile of area, the Secretary of Agriculture, upon request from the State highway department of such State may increase the share payable by the United States to any percentage up to and including the whole cost on projects on the primary system of Federal-aid highways and on projects on the secondary system when the latter is a continuation of a route on the primary system or directly connects with a route on the primary system of an adjoining State, but the average Federal pro rata allotted to all Federal-aid projects in any such State during any fiscal year shall not exceed the pro rata authorized in such State under the provisions of this act."

SEC. 4. That hereafter the shield or other insignia of the United States as shown on the seal of the United States, or any simulation thereof, shall not be used as a highway marker, directional sign, or advertising medium on or along any road or highway in the United States, which is a part of or may become a part of the primary or interstate or secondary or intercounty highway system as designated in accordance with the Federal highway act of November 9, 1921, except where heretofore or hereafter so used by the highway departments of the several States acting cooperatively through their organization, known as the American Association of State Highway Officials, and with the United States Department of Agriculture: Provided, That nothing herein shall be held to prohibit the highway department of any State from authorizing motoring organizations, associations, and corporations, heretofore engaged in sign-posting work under the direction of such highway departments, to erect and maintain such highway markers and directional signs when done without expense to the State or the United States, or to place on such markers and directional signs the insignia or name of the agency so designated, when done in a manner approved by such highway department; and any person, firm, organization, corporation, or association who shall use or shall simulate and use any shield or other insignia of the United States as a highway marker, directional sign, or advertising medium for or along such highways, or who shall destroy, mutilate, deface, tear down, or remove any highway marker or directional sign heretofore or hereafter erected by the Bureau of Public Roads at the expense of the Federal Government on said system of highways, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punishable by a fine of not to exceed $100 or by imprisonment for not more than 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 5. In every case in which, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture and the highway department of the State in question, it shall be practicable to plant and maintain shade trees along the highways authorized by said act of November 9, 1921, and by this act, the planting of such trees shall be included in the specifications provided in section 8 of said act of November 9, 1921.

SEC. 6. All acts or parts of acts in any way inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect on its passage.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 11 of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921 (42 Stat. L. 212), as amended or supplemented, be further amended by adding at the end of the second paragraph thereof the following:

"'And provided further, That in the case of any State containing unappropriated public lands and nontaxable Indians lands, individual and tribal, exceeding 5 per cent of the total area of all lands in the State in which the population, as shown by the latest available Federal census, does not exceed 10 per square mile of area, the Secretary of Agriculture, upon request from the State highway department of such State, may increase the share payable by the United States to any percentage up to and including the whole cost on projects on the primary system of Federal-aid highways and on projects on the secondary system when the latter is a continuation of a route on the primary system or directly connects with a route on the primary system of an adjoining State, but such State shall allocate and expend during the same fiscal year upon some other project or projects on the Federal-aid system, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, the amount it would have been required to expend upon such project.'

"SEC. 2. In every case in which, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture and the highway department of the State in question, it shall be practicable to plant and maintain shade trees along the highways authorized by said act of November 9, 1921, and by this act, the planting of such trees shall be included in the specifications provided in section 8 of said act of November 9, 1921.

"SEC. 3. The system of Federal-aid highways on which Federal funds may be expended in any State may exceed 7 per cent of the total highway mileage of such State by the mileage of roads on said system within national forest, Indian, or other Federal reservations therein.

"SEC. 4. Federal funds may be expended on that portion of a highway or street within a municipality having a population of 2,500 or more, along which from a point on the corporate limits inwardly the houses average more than 200 feet apart: Provided, That no Federal funds shall be expended for the construction of any bridge within or partly within any municipality having a population of more than 30,000, as shown by the latest available Federal or State census; but this limitation shall not apply in the case of an interstate bridge, including approaches, connecting such municipality in one State with a point in an adjoining State which may be within a municipality having a population of not more than 10,000.

"SEC. 5. All acts or parts of acts in any way inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect on its passage."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11139) for the appointment of an additional circuit judge for the second judicial circuit.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MICHENER). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this additional circuit judgeship was to be created on the assumption there would be three additional district judges in the southern district and one additional district court judge in the eastern district within the circuit court district. Pending the consideration of the bills which have been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask that this bill may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

SUBSCRIPTION CHARGES FOR NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, ETC.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11989) providing that subscription charges for newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals for official use may be paid for in advance.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object. There is a constant attempt being made to break down one of the most salutary provisions of the Revised Statutes to permit the payment of money in advance. These subscriptions are possible in the Diplomatic Service. We made certain exceptions and there is a tendency to keep breaking down this provision of the Revised Statutes, and I trust that there will be two other Members who will join with me in objecting to the bill at this time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, this legislation is asked for by the departments. It saves a great deal of expense. You have got to pay for it anyway, and if it can be paid for in advance it avoids the necessity of putting this provision in the appropriation bills.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It can be objected to in appropriation bills, and I do not see why any periodical would not trust the Government for a year's subscription. I object.

Mr. DYER. It is not a question of trusting the Government, but it is a question of facilitating and saving expense to the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA, Mr. SCHAFER, and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin objected.

AMENDMENT OF THE JUDICIAL CODE OF THE UNITED STATES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8270) to amend section 52 of the Judicial Code of the United States.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPEARING, Mr. DE ROUEN, and Mr. KEMP objected.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, may I ask that the objections be reserved until I can make some inquiry as to why it is objected to?

The objection was reserved.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I can not understand why there is objection to this bill. There are certain rumors that have come to me that certain corporations are objecting to it because they do not want to be sued. All that the bill provides is that in a State where there is more than one judicial district of the United States and where there is a designation by a foreign corporation doing business in that State of the secretary of state or other person, that persons living in a judicial district outside of the district in which the secretary of state or other person designated is located within the same State may sue.

Mr. SPEARING. It does not say that at all.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And is it not true that in almost every State the superintendent of insurance is the man designated to accept service for a foreign insurance company, and the superintendent of insurance as a rule resides in the capital of the State, thereby making it necessary for a plaintiff suing a foreign insurance corporation to go to the capital in order to get service?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. We have a situation in Oklahoma where we have three judicial districts. It is the practice of foreign corporations to appoint, say, the assistant secretary of state as their agent.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. If I understand the gentleman, under this bill if it passes, if I live in one of the districts other than the one in which the capital is located, I can bring suit, but under other conditions I can not bring it, unless this bill passes, unless I live in the district where the capital is located.

Mr. MACGREGOR. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Or you have to go to the capital to bring suit.

Mr. MACGREGOR. If the plaintiff does not reside within the same judicial district as the person designated he can not bring suit at all because under section 51 of the Judicial Code the action must be brought in the district where one of the parties reside.

Mr. SPEARING. Under this bill, irrespective of the district in which he lives, he may bring suit wherever he wants to in the State.

Mr. MACGREGOR. The gentleman is right, but this is a foreign corporation and the people of the whole State should have equal rights with respect to the foreign corporation permitted to do business within their State.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Suppose a resident in the northern part of the gentleman's State desires to sue a railroad corporation. If that corporation has no agent in the judicial district, then the plaintiff must go hundreds of miles in order to bring the defendant within the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. SPEARING. A resident of a State living in the district in which the agent of a foreign corporation is located can if he pleases bring suit against the corporation in a different district. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEARING, Mr. KEMP, and Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana objected.

CREATION OF ORGANIZED RURAL COMMUNITIES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8221) to authorize the creation of organized rural communities to demonstrate methods of reclamation and benefits of planned rural development.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] I ask that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. CRISP. I think this is a very meritorious bill and I regret that the gentleman has seen fit to object to it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman did not expect to have it passed on the unanimous Consent Calendar, did he?

Mr. CRISP. Well, I was very optimistic. I made application for a rule and not having received it I did the best I could.

COMPENSATION OF REGISTERS OF LOCAL LAND OFFICES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 766) to fix the compensation of registers of local land offices and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the beginning of the next fiscal year the compensation of registers of local land offices shall be a salary of $1,000 per annum each and all fees and commissions now allowed by law to such registers, but the salary, fees, and commissions of such registers shall not exceed $3,600 each per annum: Provided, That the salary of the register of the Juneau land district, Alaska, shall be $3,600 per annum.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8327) for the relief of certain members of the Navy and Marine Corps, who were discharged because of misrepresentation of age.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Who has charge of this bill?

Mr. REECE. I am not responsible for the bill, but I did sponsor a similar bill for the Army, which has passed the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is this regardless of the length of service the young man may have in the Army or the Navy? Suppose a young man enters the Navy and gives his age wrongfully. Then immediately thereafter without rendering any actual service he is discharged. Would the gentleman place that boy in the category here provided?

Mr. REECE. The bill which related to the Army applied during the World War and the Spanish War, and it applied without reference to the period of the service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would the gentleman give the boy who served only one day the privileges of the bonus, pension, and so forth? If a boy came into the service and rendered service and on application of the parents without any fault of his own was discharged, I would give that boy an honorable discharge, but where a boy enlists one day and leaves the service in a week I do not believe that he should receive it.

Mr. SCHAFER. What about boys 16 or 17 years old that the recruiting officers take into the service day after day, day in and day out?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. SCHAFER. You do not give them an honorable discharge?

Mr. REECE. Under the compensation law in order to receive a pension for disability the disability must be connected with the service. In the future if we pass a general pension bill they will follow that precedent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I will ask to have the bill passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

PAN AMERICAN POSTAL UNION RECIPROCAL FREE POSTAGE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12415), to grant freedom of postage in the United States domestic service to the correspondence of the members of the diplomatic corps and consuls of the countries of the Pan American Postal Union stationed in the United States.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

POISONS IN THE MAILS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10441) to amend section 217, as amended, of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRANSFERRING CERTAIN GOVERNMENT PROPERTY TO CITY OF DULUTH

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 2340) to transfer to the city of Duluth, Minn., the old Federal building, together with the site thereof.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Who introduced this bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I am ready to answer any questions that the gentlemen may propound, if I am capable of doing it.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object.

Mr. SCHAFER. What is the necessity for transferring this land to the city of Duluth?

Mr. CARSS. The city desires this land for park purposes in order to carry out what is known as the Burnham grouping plan. The city will pay the Government for it.

Mr. SCHAFER. How much is the land worth?

Mr CARSS. I do not know.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is there a saving clause in the bill which will prevent the city of Duluth from reselling the land to a private landowner?

Mr. CARSS. If the gentleman will read the bill I think he will find that that has been taken care of and that the interests of the Government are fully protected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute S. 2340, an identical bill, for the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon completion of the new Federal building authorized to be erected under the provisions of the act of March 2, 1907, in the city of Duluth, Minn., the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to transfer to the city of Duluth, Minn., the old Federal building, together with the site thereof, at such price and on such terms as he deems to be reasonable, and to convey such property to the city of Duluth by the usual quitclaim deed and deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

GRANTING TO FORT WAYNE, IND., AN EASEMENT OVER GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12409) to grant to the city of Fort Wayne, Ind., an easement over certain Government property.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to grant to the city of Fort Wayne, Ind., an easement over the western portion of lot 113, original plat of such city, being a strip of land 10 feet wide and 150 feet long, extending along the east side of Clinton Street south from the corner of Berry Street, such 10-foot strip being a portion of the present post-office site; such easement to continue so long as the land shall be used exclusively for street purposes: Provided, however, That the United States shall retain the right to have that portion of the base of the present tower which encroaches approximately 1 foot and 3 inches on the aforesaid 10-foot strip, remain in place, undisturbed, as though such grant had never been made: And provided further, That the city of Fort Wayne, as a consideration for such grant, shall perform all necessary work incident to the relocation of the steps, changes in entrance, approaches, and the grounds of the said post-office site; such work shall be performed under the direction and to the satisfaction of the Treasury Department, all without expense to the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GRANTING EASEMENT TO CITY OF DULUTH, MINN.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 249), granting an easement to the city of Duluth, Minn.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what relation to this resolution has the bill that we just passed a moment ago?

Mr. CARSS. This also refers to the site and permits the Secretary of the Treasury to accept title to some land which the Government is acquiring from the city, with the mineral reservation included.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute Senate Joint Resolution 119, an identical joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in carrying into effect existing legislation providing for the granting of an easement to the city of Duluth, Minn., for the use of lots 81 and 83, in block 20, in exchange for the conveyance to the United States in fee simple of lots 86 and 88 in such block 20, as an addition to the new Federal building site in said city, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to accept a title to said lots 86 and 88, in block 20, subject to the reservation of all iron ore and other valuable minerals in and upon said land, with the right to explore for, mine and remove the same, required by section 638 of the General Statutes of Minnesota of 1923.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House joint resolution was laid on the table.

IRRIGATION DAM ON THE GREYBULL RIVER, WYO.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10308) to investigate and determine the feasibility of the construction of an irrigation dam on the Greybull River, Wyo.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on behalf of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

IRRIGATION DAM ON BEAR RIVER, WYO.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10309) to investigate and determine the feasibility of the construction of an irrigation dam on the Bear River, Wyo.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on behalf of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENDING TIME LIMITATION IN RESPECT TO CERTAIN PATENTS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10435) providing for the extension of the time limitations under which patents were issued in the case of persons who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during the World War.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, pending the return of the gentleman from Indiana, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. It is true that this bill was up once before in the last Congress and without adequate hearings with reference to it. At that time the bill passed the House and also passed the Senate, but without proper safeguards. The bill was not signed by the Speaker and did not go to the President. At that time the Commissioner of Patents and various organizations of patent attorneys and manufacturers objected to its provisions.

I will state to the gentleman from New York that at this session of Congress we have had very full hearings with reference to this matter, hearings at which the Commissioner of Patents was present, and the representatives and agents of manufacturers were present, and at which representatives of the organizations of soldiers affected were present. The bill has been amended so that it is entirely satisfactory to all these people, and there is no objection to it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How many veterans are really vitally concerned in this matter?

Mr. LANHAM. According to the statistics which the American Legion was able to get, they knew of only seven cases. The number, however, is necessarily somewhat conjectural.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Do those representing those seven cases still own the patent rights?

Mr. LANHAM. I do not know that of my own information, but I think they do. I will say to the gentleman, however, that one of these men who will be affected by this legislation lives in Kansas City, and he appeared before the committee. He is still the owner of his patent rights, and was deprived of the opportunity of pressing them by reason of his service in the war.

The former objections on the part of the Commissioner of Patents have been met. He has given his approval of this bill in this modified form. It provides ample safeguards in the way of proper notice and opportunity for protest. It provides for notice to be given to everyone affected, hearings on any opposition, and the right of appeal in the case of an adverse decision. We have thrown about it all possible safeguards.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Are all these men the original inventors of the patents they claim?

Mr. LANHAM. I am not familiar with more than the seven cases. Probably there are more than seven who will be affected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, say there are 70.

Mr. LANHAM. Perhaps there may be 100. But so far as the officers of the American Legion are concerned, they know of only seven.

The Patent Commissioner offered amendments and they were adopted. The people representing the manufacturers and the patents organizations all agreed to the passage of the bill in this form. We are now drawing so near the end of the session that I fear unless we get some action upon it now it will be deferred indefinitely. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact: That patents expire in 17 years from the date of issue, as he knows, and without the privilege of renewal, and unless action is taken relatively soon some of these men will lose their rights through no fault of their own.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it not likely that we shall have another day for the consideration of the Consent Calendar, when this can be taken up?

Mr. LANHAM. That we will have another Consent Calendar day and reach this bill is entirely problematical. The rights of these men will be interfered with if we do not get this bill through. It has been so drawn and so modified that there is no objection to its passage now from anybody. The bill was reported by the committee after full hearings.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will admit that we did make a mistake in hastily passing the bill once before. That is the trouble. The veterans are overplayed. They come in here and say, "This is for the veterans," and we close our eyes and vote for it. The other bill was defectively drawn.

Mr. LANHAM. That happened at the end of a session, without due consideration being given to the measure, and its withdrawal was at the request of the very Patents Committee which has reported this bill——

Mr. SCHAFER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New York if he will agree to this bill going over without prejudice?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have been trying to debate that bill for the past 20 minutes in the endeavor to defer its consideration. That is what we tried to do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill going over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

REPEAL OF SECTION 1445, REVISED STATUTES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7216) to repeal section 1445 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is there anyone from the Navy Committee here? I suggest that the bill go over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MONUMENT TO MAJ. GEN. ARTEMAS WARD

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 263) authorizing the president and fellows of Harvard College to erect on public grounds in the District of Columbia a monument to Maj. Gen. Artemas Ward.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to select a suitable site and to grant permission to the president and fellows of Harvard College to erect, as a gift to the people of the United States, on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, D. C., a monument in memory of Maj. Gen. Artemas Ward commemorative of the services rendered by him to his country during the war of Independence: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts, that it shall be erected under the supervision of the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the monument.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MONUMENTAL URN PRESENTED BY THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House Joint Resolution 265, authorizing the President of the United States to accept a monumental urn to be presented by the Republic of Cuba and providing for its erection on an appropriate site on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a similar Senate joint resolution, No. 125, will be considered in lieu of the House joint resolution.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to accept as a gift from the Republic of Cuba, a monumental urn which shall be erected on a site on the public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, D. C., other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, the White House, or the grounds south of the White House: Provided, That the site shall be chosen by the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital with the approval of the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress and the National Commission of Fine Arts: Provided further, That the urn shall be erected under the direction and supervision of the said Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to cover the entire cost of the erection and dedication of the said urn.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House joint resolution was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RIO GRANDE RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12031) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Rio Grande River at or near Tornillo, Tex.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman from Texas whether he can give us the information we are now asking on these bridge bills?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. This is a bill introduced by my colleague [Mr. HUDSPETH], who is ill in the hospital. I am authorized to say that it is not a toll bridge but a free bridge. They were not able to construct the bridge within the time allotted and this is simply an extension of the time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman has fully answered my inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge across the Rio Grande River, at or near Tornillo, Tex., authorized to be built by W. J. Stahmann, Edgar D. Brown, L. N. Shafer, and associates, their successors and assigns, by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1925, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

With the following committee amendments:

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RIO GRANDE RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12100) to amend the act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the Gateway Bridge Co. for construction of a bridge across the Rio Grande between Brownsville, Tex., and Matamoras, Mexico," approved February 26, 1926.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there anyone present from the Lone Star State?

Mr. DENISON. I do not believe the author of the bill is present, but I can give the gentleman the information he desires.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman made an investigation as to the Gateway Bridge Co.?

Mr. DENISON. Yes. That company is owned by people living in Brownsville.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the locality?

Mr. DENISON. In the locality; yes. The bill is being amended to conform to the form we are now using.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the Gateway Bridge Co. for construction of a bridge across the Rio Grande between Brownsville, Tex., and Matamoros, Mexico," approved February 26, 1926, is amended to read as follows:

"That in order to facilitate international commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Gateway Bridge Co., a corporation organized under the laws of Delaware, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Rio Grande River, so far as the United States has jurisdiction over the waters of such river, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between Brownsville, Tex., and Matamoros, Mexico, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906, subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act, and subject to the approval of the proper authorities in the Republic of Mexico.

There is hereby conferred upon the Gateway Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property in the State of Texas needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches, as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State of Texas, upon making just compensation therefor to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

"SEC. 3. The said Gateway Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge in accordance with any laws of Texas applicable thereto, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

poration to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure, or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

"SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE CUMBERLAND RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12571) authorizing the State Highway Commission, Commonwealth of Kentucky, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Iuka, Ky.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State Highway Commission, Commonwealth of Kentucky, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Cumberland River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the town of Iuka, Ky., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12619) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Evansville, Ind.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask for some information from the gentleman from Indiana. There are two bridge bills here, one seeking to grant the permission of Congress to the State of Indiana to build a bridge and another to extend the act of March 2, 1927. Now, is it not a fact that there is a great division of sentiment in the city of Evansville as to which one, if either, of these bridges shall be built?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that there is not any division on this bill, but there is a little on the bill at the head of the calendar.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Where do they propose to build this bridge—at Dades Park?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. I do not think the location has been determined.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Is not that the only place to build the bridge?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. The bill says at or near Evansville.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object at the present time, but I want to make an investigation of it, so I ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. This bill is to grant the consent of Congress to the Highway Commission of the State of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the State highway commission have been to see me about the bill, have wired me and written me, and they are anxious to build the bridge. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not object.

I helped the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] get a bill through for Henderson in which he was interested.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes; and I want to say that the only hesitancy that I have about objecting to this bill is on account of the gentleman from Illinois. He has been nice to me and is rendering a great public service. I am very familiar with the history of this legislation. Back in about 1922 I helped the then Congressman from Evansville to get through a bridge bill for the State of Kentucky and Indiana to build the bridge. On March 2, 1927, I helped to get a bill through for the State of Indiana to build it. All this time has gone by and Indiana has not built it. I do not think there is a chance for Indiana to build the bridge, while the people of Henderson are going to build the bridge. I do not want to be placed in the attitude of objecting, but I hope the gentleman will let the bill go over one more time and have it remain on the calendar. I do not want to have to object, but I will say frankly that except of my high regard and appreciation of the gentleman from Illinois I would have no hesitancy to object.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. I may say to the gentleman, that if he asks for an extension of time with respect to his bridge I am going to see that they do not get it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I will say to the gentleman that that bill has already been passed and they have started on it.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. They have not started on it yet, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. KINCHELOE. No; the gentleman does not know it. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, that the first bill, about 1922, would not have gone through if it had not been for the gentleman from Kentucky.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice and remain on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. I object to that request. The gentleman from Kentucky has got his bridge bill through and I do not see why he does not allow this bill to go through.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If the gentleman from Wisconsin is going to object then I object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

BRIDGE ACROSS SABINE RIVER AT STARKS, LA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12623) granting the consent of Congress to the Louisiana Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Sabine River, at or near Starks, La., on the Evangeline Highway, known by the State of Louisiana as Route No. 7, to connect at or near Deweyville, Tex.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Louisiana Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Sabine River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Starks, La., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled, "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

BRIDGE ACROSS NEW RIVER, W. VA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12806) authorizing J. H. Harvell, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across New River at or near McCreery, Raleigh County, W. Va.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the Clerk call Calendar No. 690?

Mr. DENISON. A Senate bill identical with this House bill was passed to-day shortly after we convened.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; and I notice that the War Department specifically recommended against its passage.

Mr. DENISON. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin is mistaken.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Here [indicating] is the report which so states. The Assistant Secretary advised against it. This comes from bringing up the Consent Calendar in this way when many Members are not here and it is not generally known that the Consent Calendar is to be called.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It was a Senate bill that was passed this morning. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We are at a disadvantage because if the chairman of a committee or a member of the committee calls up a Senate bill in the early part of a session and we agree to it, there is nothing we can do. We are absolutely helpless in the matter.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to this statement:

> However, as to authorizing the construction of a toll bridge by private interests, the department would urge against favorable action as it is not believed that a private toll bridge at this point should be authorized.
> R. W. DUNLAP, Acting Secretary.

It got hustled through here before anybody in the House knew anything about it.

The SPEAKER. May the Chair call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that that bill did not require unanimous consent. The bill was called up by motion, as a matter of right, it being a Senate bill and a similar House bill being on the calendar. It has nothing whatever to do with the Consent Calendar.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] occasionally gets up here and makes a statement which seems to indicate he has some suspicion about something. This objection was not made by the Secretary of War at all, although the gentleman from Wisconsin said it was.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I did not say that. I read the name of the Acting Secretary of War.

Mr. DENISON. A moment ago, I will state to the gentleman, and I am sure every Member of the House will bear me out, the gentleman stated the War Department objected to this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It did. The gentleman just stated that I said the Secretary of War. I did not say that. I said the War Department and then I read what the Assistant Secretary said, acting for the War Department.

Mr. DENISON. But the gentleman from Wisconsin is mistaken. It is not the War Department, it is the Department of Agriculture, and yet the gentleman from Wisconsin has made the statement time and again that it was the War Department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Department of Agriculture is more concerned, because the Department of Agriculture is entrusted with the building of Federal-aid roads.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman from New York knows, and I think the gentleman from Wisconsin knows, or ought to know, that these letters which are signed by the Department of Agriculture are written by the engineer in charge of the Bureau of Roads. He objects to all toll bridges privately owned, but he does not run the Congress. He has his views, and we ask him for them, and if he has any objections to a bill he states them. He undertakes to dictate to the House the policy we shall follow. If he does not think a bridge ought to be built at a certain place he recommends against it, but I take it that the House has the right to exercise its judgment, and that the House is the one that ought to decide whether the bridge shall be built, rather than a subordinate in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The trouble about these bridge bills is this: In the old days the construction of a bridge over a navigable stream came up on rare occasions, and the question of obtaining the permission of the War Department was, as you might say, pro forma. Since the automobile and the building of roads, and especially Federal-aid roads, we have created conditions whereby there is an enormous value to a bridge connecting two Federal-aid roads or two great highways. So the consent of Congress is no longer a pro forma matter, but is of vital importance. I agree with the views of the head of the Road Bureau in the Department of Agriculture. We are near the end of the session now, but beginning with the next session there are enough Members in the House who will object to every private toll bridge connecting two Federal highways.

Mr. DENISON. I am glad to know how the gentleman feels about it, but the gentleman is giving me no information. My committee has been studying the subject for three or four years. They began the study of the subject before the gentleman from New York knew there was such a question. Before we report favorably a bill granting a franchise for the construction of a toll bridge by private individuals we obtain information as to whether the State, the county, or the city will probably, in the near future, construct the bridge. If we have evidence that there is no possibility of the city or county or State constructing the bridge, and the people of the community want the bridge, there is no other way except to have it constructed by private capital.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am not finding fault with the work of the committee—it is a matter of policy. I may be wrong, but a great many Members of the House are wrong with me on the subject, and we are going to assert it.

Mr. DENISON. We only authorize the construction of a toll bridge by private parties when the people can get it no other way. If the gentleman will concern himself by proposing some plan to get rid of these privately owned ferries, where in nearly every instance the ferry tolls are higher than bridge tolls—and he will find that all of the ferries are privately owned—he will be rendering a real public service, and will be contributing toward improving our transportation difficulties.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not object to having a toll bridge which will pay for itself in a certain time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire, in view of what the gentleman from Illinois has said, to read from the report. This is from the War Department and not from the Department of Agriculture:

> WAR DEPARTMENT, April 13, 1928.
> Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives.
> So far as the interests committed to this department are concerned, I know of no objection to the favorable consideration of the accompanying bill (H. R. 12678, 70th Cong., 1st sess.) authorizing the Calhoun Bridge Co., an Illinois corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Illinois River at or near Grafton, Ill.
>
> The Illinois River is, however, wholly within the limits of the State of Illinois, and the proposed bridge can consequently be authorized by State law and duly constructed, provided the plans are submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War before construction is commenced, in conformity with the Federal law contained in section 9 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899. The enactment of this measure, therefore, appears to be unnecessary.
> DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
> Secretary of War.

The Acting Secretary of the Department of Agriculture says:

> However, as to authorizing the construction of a toll bridge by private interests, the department would urge against favorable action, as it is not believed that a private toll bridge at this point should be authorized.

The Secretary of War thinks this bill is unnecessary. Here is a bridge which is to be wholly within a State, and which can be constructed under State law, and the Secretary of War says the enactment of the pending bill is unnecessary. The Acting Secretary of the Department of Agriculture protests against it and says it ought not to be enacted into law.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, under an act of Congress passed in 1899 where the navigable portion of the river lies wholly within a single State the bridge can be authorized by the State legislature. Whenever bills are referred to the War Department for information the Secretary of War—if the navigable portion of the river lies wholly within a single State—advises the committee to that effect so that the committee can know, and if the navigable portion of the river does lie wholly within a single State the Secretary says it is unnecessary to pass the act of Congress, because it can be done by the State legislature. But the State legislature may not meet for a year or two years, and so Members constantly come to Congress and ask the consent of Congress to build bridges, even though they could at some later time be constructed under an act of the State legislature. That has been done twenty-five or thirty times this session. We do not refuse to pass an act granting authority to build a bridge simply because the parties could go before the State legislature and obtain authority to do so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We are nearly a thousand miles from where this proposed bridge is to be erected wholly within the State of Illinois. Speaking generally, I think that when a bridge is to be constructed wholly within the limits of a State the State legislature ought first to pass on it.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, the committee thinks otherwise; but, Mr. Speaker, the Members of Congress may well judge these things for themselves. I am not the author of this bill. The author presented the bill, no doubt, because the community wanted the bridge. The bill was referred to the committee, and we have acted upon it. We reported the bill to the House, and it was on the calendar. A similar Senate bill was passed and was on the Speaker's table. I called up the Senate bill at the proper time and in the usual and proper manner under the rules of the House, and the Senate bill was passed without opposition.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, we have a number of other bills here before us. I know that we are anxious to approach them. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, J. H. Harvell, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across New River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near McCreery, Raleigh County, W. Va., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of West Virginia, any political subdivision thereof within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of such State governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues, or profit, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion cost, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 3. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the State of West Virginia or by any municipality or other political subdivision or public agency thereof, under the provisions of section 2 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 4. J. H. Harvell, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge file with the Secretary of War and with the Highway Department of the State of West Virginia, a sworn, itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and at the request of the Highway Department of the State of West Virginia shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual reasonable cost of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge, for the purpose of such investigation the said J. H. Harvell, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 2 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 5. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to J. H. Harvell, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 6. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12877) authorizing the Los Olmos International Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Rio Grande River at or near Weslaco, Tex.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] inform us whether this International Bridge Co. is a local company?

Mr. DENISON. I am sorry, but I do not have that information.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I spoke to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], and he assured me that these people were going to build the bridge and then would not assign the franchise.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. CROIX RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12912) authorizing the St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Croix River on the Grantsburg Road.

NAVAL ESCORT FOR BODIES OF DECEASED OFFICERS, ETC.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12694) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to provide an escort for the bodies of deceased officers, enlisted men, and nurses.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have conferred with the distinguished lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS]. It is understood that this is simply discretionary and that it will not necessitate the detail of an officer or man in each instance where the body is sent a great distance.

Mrs. ROGERS. No; it is discretionary with the Secretary of the Navy. The Navy has been very much embarrassed and greatly criticized because at the present time they are prohibited from sending an escort with the body of an officer who dies; there is no authorization for sending a person as escort for an enlisted man, and in a number of instances the friends of the officers have collected money they could ill afford to spend to send an escort so that the family might feel that the Navy was not remiss in paying a certain and only decent respect to the dead.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And, of course, this applies to the bodies of officers and men?

Mrs. ROGERS. Yes; and also of nurses——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to furnish an escort not to exceed one person to the place of burial for the bodies of officers, enlisted men, or nurses who have lost their lives in the naval service. Such expenses as are incurred for this purpose shall be paid from the proper appropriation: Provided, That section 1587 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to lend, at his discretion, to the American Legion convention committee, for use at the annual State convention, to be held at Schenectady, N. Y., on September 6, 7, and 8, 1928, 500 cots, 500 mattresses, and 1,500 blankets: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered at such time prior to the holding of the said convention as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the general chairman of said convention committee of the American Legion, Joseph E. Haubner: Provided further, That the Secretary of War before delivering said property shall take from said Joseph E. Haubner a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, and the whole without expense to the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RIO GRANDE NEAR WESLACO, TEX.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we now return to the bill H. R. 12877, Calendar No. 692. A little while ago I asked to have it passed over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 692. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate international commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Los Olmos International Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Rio Grande River, so far as the United States has jurisdiction over the waters of such river, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Weslaco, Tex., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, subject to the approval of the proper authorities in Mexico.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the Los Olmos International Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property in the State of Texas needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State of Texas, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Los Olmos International Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge in accordance with any laws of Texas applicable thereto, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1926.

SEC. 4. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the Los Olmos International Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] gave me the information that this company is composed of local people whose intention is to construct the bridge.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. This application is made by local people, the mayor, and city council, and two bankers. It is for the accommodation of business and trade going into Mexico.

Mr. SCHAFER. It is not for use to bring over this cheap Mexican labor to compete with our American labor?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No; I think those Americans who go over there want to go over in order to get what we have not got in Texas. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the word "River."

Page 2, at the end of line 4, insert "conditions and limitations contained in this act and subject to the."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF THE TOWN OF SPRINGDALE, UTAH

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to grant permission to the town of Springdale, Utah, to divert through such piping facilities as may be necessary, for domestic and other uses within the limits of said town of Springdale, Utah, as now constituted, water from certain springs in the Zion National Park, Utah, situated at the head of what is known as Oak Creek, which crosses the main highway about one-half mile below the park boundary, and located in approximately section 20, township 41 south, range 10 west, Salt Lake meridian, subject to such conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and subject further to the right of said Secretary to terminate any permit granted hereunder when, in his judgment, the particular water shall at any time be needed by the Government in the administration and protection of the Zion National Park: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to assert on behalf of the United States or deny to the State of Utah the ownership of the waters aforesaid.

With committee amendments as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "empowered" and insert the words "directed, under such reasonable regulations as he may prescribe"; on line 8, after the word "Utah," strike out the words "as now constituted"; on page 2, line 2, after the word "meridian," strike out the remainder of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF THE KANSAS OR KAW TRIBE OF INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8901) to amend and further extend the benefits of the act approved March 3, 1925, entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, and enter judgment in any and all claims, of whatever nature, which the Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians may have or claim to have against the United States, and for other purposes."

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

TO AMEND THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 13446 may be taken from the Union Calendar and considered at this time, for the reason that it is of an emergency nature.

Mr. Speaker, when the Army appropriation was under consideration early in the session quite a controversy occurred over the question of providing funds for the annual school for small-arms firing and rifle competition. The House finally approved the expenditure, the Senate concurring.

In order that authority for making this training activity an annual event, I introduced H. R. 8550, which passed the House and went to the Senate, where everything after the enacting clause was stricken from the bill and new matter inserted, materially altering its original purpose. It was passed by the House in this form, disapproved by the President, returned to the House, and referred to the Military Committee. I then introduced H. R. 13446, containing the features of the original bill, which is now on the Union Calendar with a favorable report.

Fearing that the bill will not be reached before adjournment and that when the War Department budget is being prepared no authorization for this training program will exist, and that the National Guard reserve and other nonprofessional forces will again be under the necessity of fighting for their program, I request unanimous consent that H. R. 13446 be taken up for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if he has consulted with the members of the Committee on Military Affairs in regard to that bill.

Mr. SPEAKS. The acting chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is present. I have spoken with him in regard to it.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman has no authority from the committee, because the matter never came before our committee; but the bill he refers to is substantially the same bill as was reported out of our committee and reported unanimously. It is not the bill that was vetoed by the President. This is substantially the same bill as was reported unanimously from our committee. I hope the bill will be passed

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is this bill on the Consent Calendar?

Mr. SPEAKS. It is on the Union Calendar. I ask this consideration for the reason that next fall, if it is not passed now, we will be confronted with the exact condition of controversy that came up when the bill was up before. There will be a repetition of it unless we make the authorization here.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Why was not the bill put on the Consent Calendar?

Mr. SPEAKS. That was an oversight. The intention was that it should be considered before adjournment. I think you will agree with me that there is little likelihood of that unless we pass it now.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

WINNEBAGO TRIBE OF INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7346) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment thereon in claims which the Winnebago Tribe of Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, this is a jurisdictional bill that has come from the Committee on Indian Affairs and it seems to me the House is entitled to have some explanation as to why such request is made.

Mr. HOOPER. I am prepared to give the gentleman an explanation. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is sick. He has made a special study of these matters, and he asked that I make this request.

Mr. HASTINGS. If that is the situation I have no objection.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12563) authorizing the West Kentucky Bridge & Transportation Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Henderson, Ky.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin for doing something I was going to do myself. I want to say, so that the people of Indiana may know, that if it had not been for the gentleman from Wisconsin asking unanimous consent to keep H. R. 11357, the other Indiana bill, on the calendar more than anybody else, it would have passed the House some time ago.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is out of order and his remarks should be stricken from the RECORD. The bill was objected to and he had no right to make his last speech under the parliamentary situation, as he spoke neither under a reservation to object or by unanimous consent.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I want to know whether the gentleman denies that statement.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for two minutes in order to answer the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to speak out of order for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I couple with that the request that the gentleman from Kentucky, myself, may have two minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. May I ask both gentlemen to withhold their debate or duel and to withdraw their requests at this time?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request for the present.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If the gentleman asks that I am delighted.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ALLEGHENY RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12913) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Allegheny River at or near the borough of Eldred, McKean County, Pa.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge across the Allegheny River at or near the borough of Eldred, McKean County, Pa., authorized to be built by the commissioners of McKean County, Pa., by the act of Congress approved May 13, 1926, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13069) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Minnesota to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Mississippi River, at or near Aitkin, Minn.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Minnesota to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Aitkin, Minn., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WARRANTS IN CRIMINAL CASES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9784) for the issuance and execution of warrants in criminal cases and to authorize bail.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill requires three objections. Are there other objections?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair notes two objections and the bill requires three objections. Are there other objections? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever a warrant issues by order of court on any indictment or information now or hereafter returned or filed, such warrant may be addressed to any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States and may be executed in any place within the limits of the United States, or subject to the jurisdiction thereof, by the arrest of the person named therein and his removal forthwith to the district wherein the indictment or information is pending, there to be committed, let to bail, and otherwise dealt with according to law: Provided, That where any person so arrested in a district other than the district wherein the indictment or information is pending is entitled to bail, he shall be admitted to bail upon application therefor, by any justice or judge of the United States, or United States commissioner of such district for his appearance for trial in the court in which such indictment or information is pending; and where any person so admitted to bail fails to appear according to the terms of any bond or undertaking given for such appearance, and such bail is forfeited, he shall not again be admitted to bail unless by the judge of the court in which such indictment or information is pending: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of the officer making the arrest in a district other than the district in which the indictment is found or information filed to take the person so arrested, if requested so to do, before such justice, judge, or commissioner for the purpose of giving bail.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "now" and insert in lieu thereof the word "heretofore"; page 2, line 1, strike out the words "committed, let to bail, and otherwise"; and in line 6, after the words "United States," insert the words "or the Philippine Islands."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment: In line 4, page 1, strike out the words "or information or."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "or information or."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, if you will look at the first paragraph of this bill you will see that it reads "that whenever a warrant issues by order of court on any indictment or any information heretofore or hereafter returned or filed."

Now, what does that mean? I have no objection to bringing a man into the jurisdiction of a certain court on an indictment because it is reasonable to assume that the grand jury has heard the evidence and found it sufficient, in their opinion, to convict. You must remember that an information can be issued by a district attorney by simply signing his name to a piece of paper.

Now, what does that mean? That means you can bring a man from Seattle, Wash., to Miami, Fla., on the signature of a district attorney who might be misinformed as to the facts or acting through spite.

I think this bill goes too far, and while I do not want to appear as offering an objection to bringing criminals before the court having proper jurisdiction after they have been indicted, I do not feel you should provide that when an information is issued a man must respond, because the court issues the warrant upon application of the district attorney and makes no inquiry as to the facts. There is a great deal of difference between an indictment and an information. Leave out information and I will support the bill. We should speed up the prosecution of criminals but do not place too much power in the hands of the district attorney; it might be abused.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Where does the gentleman get the information you can bring a man into another jurisdiction on the signature of the district attorney?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. How is an information issued?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Before you can apprehend a man you must have a bench warrant.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The bill says "or information." It does not say that a man has to be indicted. Bench warrants are issued on application of the district attorney, practically automatically issued when the district attorney asks for one.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He would not be indicted on a misdemeanor.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And this is always on some one's responsibility.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Suppose the district attorney has been misinformed as to the facts. Why can he not wait until he brings his case before the grand jury?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Suppose the district attorney is misinformed as to the facts, he would be misinformed when he presented it to the grand jury.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It would depend on whether the man would go before the grand jury and make the same statement under oath. He might say something to the district attorney not under oath that he would not say when he goes before the grand jury and is placed under oath. Does the gentleman want somebody in New York taken all the way to San Francisco because the district attorney in San Francisco issues an information against him?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. You also say here "heretofore"; how far back are you going?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is familiar with the statute of limitations.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from New York has been complaining about the action of the Federal courts, and I think the gentleman ought to give some attention to this matter.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I never complain of the action of the Federal courts in getting criminals.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Neither do I.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I complain of the Federal courts in "butting in" where they have absolutely no jurisdiction. That is my complaint against the Federal courts.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Under the terms of this bill the man is deprived of the right he now has to raise the question of probable cause.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He can raise that question in the jurisdiction where he is brought.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; when he is brought there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He can give bail and go there of his own accord.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Suppose you were to take a man from New York to St. Louis, into a strange territory, or from St. Louis to Miami, Fla., simply on an information.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The man must have been there in order to commit a crime.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. He is accused of it, not by a grand jury, but on an information which is a one-sided affair.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A grand jury proceeding is a one-sided proceeding.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is, to a certain extent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. To every extent.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But it is fairer than any proceeding before a district attorney in his private office.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The complaint or information the gentleman refers to would be verified by the county attorney or the district attorney, would it not?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. This is a proceeding in a Federal court, not in a State court.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Is it not the common practice in all the States upon a verified information being filed that a warrant for the arrest of the defendant shall be issued and that he may be brought there from any State of the Union without any preliminary hearing?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On extradition?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes; on extradition.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Not in connection with the Federal court.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. What is the difference?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Here is the difference: Suppose you are trying to make a case, and you are the district attorney, and you are having trouble getting the information, and you get hold of a man who lives in your jurisdiction, and you say to him, "Now, we have all the facts. We know that Jim Smith and John Jones in New York and you here in St. Louis conspired to violate this law. Now, give us the information and tell us all about it and we will use you as a Government witness and we will get the men in New York." The district attorney then issues the information. They do not verify this man's statements. It is just as easy to take this man before the grand jury and indict if the facts warrant it. If they follow that procedure, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM and Mr. WHITE of Colorado rose.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word of the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. WHITE] is recognized.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this bill in my judgment is one of the most vicious that has come before this body. It is in substantial effect a return to the dark ages. What does it propose? It provides that if a warrant is issued the marshal or deputy marshal in whose hands it is placed may go anywhere in the United States and arrest the designated perpetrator of the crime alleged, who may give bail upon petition therefor. There is not one case in a hundred, in my opinion, in which the party arrested will know that he has that right, for the arresting officer may take the prisoner anywhere in the United States without apprising him of any of his rights.

It goes on further in the second proviso and states that the party shall be taken before a commissioner or other officer designated to be admitted to bail if he requests it. The person arrested may not have sufficient knowledge to enable him to exercise that right. The present law is that when one is arrested he must be taken before an officer designated, and opportunity given him to furnish bail, and an inquiry had as to his identity. Are we going to establish the rule that American citizens may be arrested by the Federal Government anywhere in this country of ours and removed without regard to distance, without regard to the nature and character of the crime—that one may be so taken even when he says, "I am not the party designated in the warrant"?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I had intended to offer a further amendment, striking out the words "if requested so to do."

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. The bill is vicious in every way.

Mr. DENISON. I think the proper amendment would be to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. I think so, too. So it strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that we ought not to establish this kind of a precedent in our country where a citizen without an opportunity to give bail or to show before a tribunal that he is not the party that is designated in the warrant may be taken anywhere in the United States. Who is going to pay the expenses of the return of the person so arrested and removed—when it is established that he is not the party named in the warrant?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If he could establish that he is not the person named in the warrant this bill does not affect his rights.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. They do not give him the opportunity unless he demands it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows that if it was a matter of mistaken identity he is protected by habeas corpus.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. But he will be taken from his home town across the country before he knows that he has such rights. Unless he demands it, the arresting officer can take him at once across the country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman states but one side of the question. The other side of the question is that we have crooks who are engaged in selling fraudulent oil stock and other false articles, using the mails for purposes of fraud, who simply can not be brought to trial by the Department of Justice by reason of existing law. All that this bill does is this: That where an indictment is found or a bench warrant issued—and the gentleman knows that a warrant is not issued unless there is probable cause for the arrest—the court reaches out and brings the man back to its jurisdiction. Under the present practice the man is entitled to a hearing before a commissioner in another State, and whereas the Government has no witnesses, where the Government is not in a position to present its case, the result is that he is either released or, if held, can take an appeal from the decision of the commission and delays his removal so long that the Government loses its witnesses and as a practical matter he escapes trial and conviction.

Anyone who raises the question of mistaken identity can protect his rights, because the right of habeas corpus is not taken away from him. If a mistake of identity can be established, no right is taken by this bill.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Is not the gentleman assuming the very thing that is to be tried—that is, the guilt of the party arrested?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not at all.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. The gentleman says that it will enable the bringing into court of these crooks, and these men that are swindling the people—therefore you are assuming that they are crooks and swindlers.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Anyone who swindles is a crook.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. But the gentleman is assuming that they are swindlers.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Did anyone else appear before the committee outside of the Attorney General?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, the crooks never do appear.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I mean attorneys.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment again reported?

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. This is an amendment to a committee amendment. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TO PROTECT TRADE-MARKS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13109) to protect trade-marks used in commerce, to authorize the registration of such trade-marks, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LASSEN VOLCANIC NATIONAL PARK, CALIF.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11405) to acquire an area of State land situate in the Lassen Volcanic National Park, State of California, by exchange.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept on behalf of the United States title to the northeast quarter northeast quarter section 27, township 30 north, range 5 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, situate within the exterior boundaries of Lassen Volcanic National Park, from the State of California, and in exchange thereof may patent a like area of public land situate in the same State. The land which may be acquired by the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become a part of Lassen Volcanic National Park.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, strike out "a like area of public land" and insert "an area of unreserved, vacant, nonmineral public land of equal value."

The committee amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PHILIPPINE CONSTABULARY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 3463) to recognize commissioned service in the Philippine Constabulary in determining rights of officers of the Regular Army.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is one of the bills which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], who is ill, asked to have passed over without prejudice. I make that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

QUEEN EMMA AND DAMON ESTATES, HAWAII

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 604 (H. R. 11847), to authorize the acquisition of the Queen Emma and Damon estates, and the Halawa site in the vicinity of Fort Kamehameha, Hawaii, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object to this, but I do think that we should be permitted to go on with the call of the calendar and not be asked to return to bills which have been passed over.

Mr. JAMES. I would not ask this if it were not for the fact that the Government can save several thousand dollars by passing the bill at this time.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think it is unfair to do things of this kind. We all ought to have a chance to have our bills called. I shall not object to this.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause condemnation proceedings to be instituted for the purpose of acquiring certain tracts of land in the vicinity of Fort Kamehameha Reservation, Territory of Hawaii, hereinafter described, for use as a flying field, and that a sum not exceeding $1,145,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the acquisition of the fee title to said land either by purchase or condemnation, to wit: That portion of the Queen Emma and Damon estates lying directly north of and adjoining Fort Kamehameha Reservation, east of the Fort Kamehameha-Puuloa Junction Road, south of the plantation road just north of Loco-Lelepaua and extending to the Rodgers Airport and Keehii Lagoon on the east consisting approximately of 1,434 acres, at a cost not exceeding $420,000, and also the Halawa site consisting of about 862 acres and immediately adjoining the Queen Emma and Damon estates at a cost not exceeding $725,000.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "fee,' insert the word "simple."

Line 9, after the word "also," insert "a portion of."

Line 10, strike out the word "site" and insert "district."

The committee amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read: "A bill to authorize the acquisition of portions of the Queen Emma and Damon estates and a portion of the Halawa district in the vicinity of Fort Kamehameha, Hawaii, and for other purposes."

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, EASTERN AND WESTERN DISTRICTS OF SOUTH CAROLINA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12811) to provide for the appointment of one additional district judge for the eastern and western districts of South Carolina.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one additional district judge for the United States District Court for the Eastern and Western Districts of South Carolina, who shall at the time of his appointment be a resident and a citizen of the State of South Carolina.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COAL AND ASPHALT DEPOSITS IN THE CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12574) to extend certain existing leases upon the coal and asphalt deposits in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations to September 25, 1932, and permit extension of time to complete payment on coal purchases.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, at the desire of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], to pass this bill over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PER CAPITA PAYMENT TO PINE RIDGE SIOUX INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13342) to authorize a per capita payment to the Pine Ridge Sioux Indians of South Dakota.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. I ask unanimous consent to pass it over without prejudice.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I hope that will not be done.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Montana does not desire that to be done.

Mr. LEAVITT. I wish to be heard, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to withdraw from funds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Pine Ridge Sioux Indians of South Dakota a sum sufficient to make a $10 per capita payment to said Indians, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, when the committee report was made on this bill we had no report from the Secretary of the Interior, but on account of the emergency existing and the hardship of these Indians, the action of the committee was to place the bill on the calendar with the understanding that there should be embodied in the committee's report the report of the Secretary of the Interior when received.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman says there is a great emergency?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes. There are something over 4,000 of these Indians, and a family will average four to five or six people. At the beginning of the spring season, when the crops are put in, that amount of cash is of very material benefit.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over temporarily, so that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] can make a brief investigation. Possibly I will withdraw my objection to it then.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan, that the bill be passed over temporarily?

There was no objection.

FOREST RESEARCH IN THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12878) to insure adequate supplies of timber and other forest products for the people of the United States, to promote the full use for timber growing and other purposes of forest lands in the United States, including farm wood lots and those abandoned areas not suitable for agricultural production, and to secure the correlation and the most economical conduct of forest research in the Department of Agriculture, through research in reforestation, timber growing, protection, utilization, forest economics, and related subjects, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CURRY. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. CURRY. I may not be opposed to the bill itself, but it is of such importance that I do not think it should be considered on the Consent Calendar. It involves too much money, is controversial, and too important.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman from California that I took this matter up with the department and with the Budget Bureau. I conferred with the gentleman from California a few weeks ago about it. I do not think the gentleman will object if he looks into it.

Mr. CURRY. Of course, the Forestry Bureau of the Department of Agriculture will not object to any amount of money it can get, or to any extension of its jurisdiction and power.

Mr. McSWEENEY. The Budget Bureau has asked for a larger program in this regard. The head of the Budget says he would like Congress to establish a definite program. This is the request of General Lord.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I have not the same high regard for General Lord's perspicacity and omniscience as some others have. I do not think he knows anything more about this bill than I do, and probably I do not know as much about it as I should.

However, I have confidence in the Members who are advocating the bill and will therefore withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute Senate bill 3556 for the House bill.

Mr. TILSON. Is it an identical bill or a similar bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The House bill provides for a station in Hawaii and the other bill for a station in the Southern States.

Mr. McSWEENEY. That is the only difference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does it omit the station in Hawaii?

Mr. McSWEENEY. No; the House bill includes that station.

The SPEAKER. If consent is granted for the consideration of the bill, the Chair understands it is the intention of the gentleman from Ohio to offer an amendment to the Senate bill to conform to the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to conduct such investigations, experiments, and tests as he may deem necessary under sections 2 to 10, inclusive, in order to determine, demonstrate, and promulgate the best methods of reforestation and of growing, managing, and utilizing timber, forage, and other forest products, of maintaining favorable conditions of water flow and the prevention of erosion, of protecting timber and other forest growth from fire, insects, disease, or other harmful agencies, of obtaining the fullest and most effective use of forest lands, and to determine and promulgate the economic considerations which should underlie the establishment of sound policies for the management of forest land and the utilization of forest products: Provided, That in carrying out the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture may cooperate with individuals and public and private agencies, organizations, and institutions, and, in connection with the collection, investigation, and tests of foreign woods, he may also cooperate with individuals and public and private agencies, organizations, and institutions in other countries; and receive money contributions from cooperators under such conditions as he may impose, such contributions to be covered into the Treasury as a special fund, which is hereby appropriated and made available until expended as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, for use in conducting the activities authorized by this act,

SEC. 2. That for conducting fire, silvicultural, and other forest investigations and experiments the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to maintain the following forest experiment stations for the regions indicated, and in addition to establish and maintain one such station for the Intermountain region in Utah and adjoining States, one in Alaska, and one in the tropical possessions of the United States in the West Indies:

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McSWEENEY: On page 5, line 2, strike out the period, insert a comma, and in addition insert the following: "And in addition to establish and maintain one such station for the intermountain region of Utah and adjoining States, one for Alaska, one in Hawaii, and one in the tropical possessions of the United States in the West Indies, and one additional station in the Southern States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

Mr. LEAVITT, by permission of the House, presented the following:

H. R. 6091—S. 1183—Seventieth Congress

WHY THE McSWEENEY-McNARY FOREST RESEARCH BILL SHOULD BECOME LAW

THE SOCIETY OF AMERICAN FORESTERS

1. The McSweeney-McNary bill is at bottom a comprehensive forest-research porgram for the United States Department of Agriculture. It is one of a series of Federal legislative acts beginning with the Clarke-McNary Act, continuing with the Woodruff-McNary bill, and designed when completed to cover the forestry functions of the various bureaus in the Department of Agriculture.

2. It was introduced at the request of the National Forestry Program Committee. The program committee has interested itself for many years in constructive forestry legislation, and contains representation from a broad group of public and industrial interests. The committee has sponsored the bill at the request of the Society of American Foresters.

3. The bill is based upon the recommendations for organic forest research legislation made by a special committee on forest research of the Washington section of the society in a comprehensive report entitled "A National Program of Forest Research." It is based, therefore, upon a thoroughgoing and detailed study of national requirements.

4. The bill codifies and rounds out the existing legislative authority for forest research in the United States Department of Agriculture. it also carries authorizations for different classes of research, but no appropriations. It is, therefore, both a functional program of the kind of research which can and should be undertaken, and a fiscal program which will guide the Department of Agriculture, the Budget, and Congress in making annual appropriations for the department. The bill is a step toward general recognition and indorsement of a clear-cut program. It is an attempt to raise the sights on forest research requirements to something approaching national needs and to insure sustained development by setting up definite objectives.

5. The bill provides for all classes of forest research, silviculture, and forest management, or the renewal and growing of forest crops; the protection of forests against fire and also against insect and fungous diseases; the influences of the forest upon stream flow, erosion, etc.; forest ranges and their utilization by livestock and game; wild life as a product and in its relation to forest production; the utilization of wood and other forest products; and, finally, the economic aspects of all these questions. The intent is to build upon established research units, such as the regional forest experiment stations and the forest-products laboratory. It is not intended to change the existing responsibility of the Forest Service, the Bureau of Plant Industry, Bureau of Entomology, Biological Survey, and the Weather Bureau.

6. The investigation of the Society of American Foresters shows conclusively the need for greatly enlarged research programs by individuals, corporations, industries, institutions, the States, and the Federal Government. It is estimated that present expenditures for forest research by all agencies total about $2,600,000. The society committee believes that total expenditures of nine to twelve million dollars by the end of a decade are urgently needed and would not be unreasonable because of the basic place of forest research in such things as:

a. The maximum productivity for timber growing and related purposes of one-fourth and undoubtedly more of our entire land area—an area not much below that of improved agricultural land in the United States.

b. Supplies of wood and other forest products ample to meet American requirements, which are now nearly half of world requirements.

c. Reduction of waste in the manufacture and utilization of wood, which is now responsible for about two-thirds of the annual cut from our forests, and for which we have the scientific foundation only in small part.

d. A satisfactory silvicultural and protection technique for the richest and most complex Temperate Zone forests in the world, for which now we have only the beginnings of a traditional technique and only a relatively small start toward a scientific basis.

e. A scientific basis for making forest lands most effective for watershed protection, and for assuring satisfactory production and use of the forage, wild life, recreational, and other forest resources, consistent with such watershed protection and with timber production.

f. A foundation in economic facts for forest-land policies, including the correlation of uses, for forestry legislation, etc.

g. Rapidly increasing annual expenditures on forestry in the United States by all agencies already probably totaling about $20,000,000, every dollar of which should be made to count to the utmost.

h. The permanence of the forest industries, which as a group rank about fourth among American industries and which have a capitalization of about $3,600,000,000, exclusive of forest land and stumpage worth at least $10,000,000,000 more. Such permanence depends absolutely upon a continuous supply of wood.

7. Additional reasons why the society committee feels that it has been conservative in recommending for all agencies total expenditures on forest research which will reach from nine to twelve million dollars by the end of a decade are:

a. Expenditures by the Federal Government and the States for agricultural research now total from eighteen to twenty million dollars, and the work is concentrated largely upon about 500,000,000 acres of improved agricultural land, an area but little larger than the increasing area of forest land.

b. A single corporate group, the American Telephone & Telegraph, is expending $10,000,000 a year in research; the General Electric Co., $3,000,000; the Du Pont Co., $2,000,000; the General Motors Research Corporation, $1,000,000; the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., $1,000,000. In July, 1924, the expenditures on industrial research in the United States were estimated at $75,000,000, and the National Bank of Commerce in New York in December, 1926, estimated these expenditures at one hundred to two hundred million dollars a year.

c. The society committee devotes 125 pages of its report (22–146) very largely to a discussion of unsolved research problems with a feeling that the list is very far from complete.

8. Of the nine to twelve million total, the society committee believes that the Federal Government should by the end of another decade be contributing about one-third, although eventually one-fourth would probably be reasonable. Some of the reasons for this are:

a. Federal ownership or control, chiefly in national forests, of one-fifth of our forest lands.

b. Ownership by farmers in wood lots of nearly one-third of our forest land, with the same reason for Federal aid through research as in agriculture.

c. The interstate or international character of stream-flow regulation and of the prevention and control of forest diseases and insect epidemics.

d. The national aspects of manufacture, waste, distribution, and consumption of lumber, pulp and paper, and other forest products.

e. The necessity for Federal leadership in such investigations as forest taxation, a forest or timber survey, etc.

f. The Federal obligation to stimulate the development of forestry and the fact that in research lies one of the cheapest, most effective, and most far-reaching methods.

9. The Department of Agriculture has a large responsibility in Federal forest research because forestry at bottom is primarily a question of land use on all fours with agriculture, and wood and other forest products are land products.

10. By the end of a decade both the society and national forestry program committee believe that expenditures in the Department of Agriculture for forest research should, to meet Federal obligations and national requirements, reach the amounts which have been specified in the various sections of the McSweeney-McNary bill; also that the amounts should be authorized in an organic act which would codify and round out legislative authority and help to insure sustained development of the work. The McSweeney-McNary bill constitutes such an organic act.

11. The stage has now been reached when the situation calls unmistakably for the development of forest research as a big national undertaking, on a scale commensurate with the movement to acquire national and other public forests; with the drive to place our entire forest area under protection against fire; with the effort to bring about the practice of forestry on privately owned lands; with the development of agricultural research in the United States. The national need for forest research requires in the future far greater breadth of view and greater vision than it has yet received. The McSweeney-McNary bill meets in a comprehensive and reasonably adequate way for the next 10 years the obligations of the Federal Department of Agriculture in such a development of forest research.

PINE RIDGE SIOUX INDIANS OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 715, H. R. 13342, to authorize a per capita payment to the Pine Ridge Sioux Indians of South Dakota.

Mr. TILSON. Was this bill passed over without prejudice?

Mr. HOOPER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 715. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to withdraw from funds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Pine Ridge Sioux Indians of South Dakota a sum sufficient to make a $10 per capita payment to said Indians, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEAVITT: Page 1, line 8, strike out "may be prescribed" and insert in lieu thereof "he may prescribe."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHILD HEALTH DAY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 184) designating May 1 as Child Health Day.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of saying that I shall not object to this bill, but I do think it might establish a precedent for the observance of many days during the year which are very appealing. I doubt the wisdom of this policy but the purpose which it is sought to observe and commemorate is one so close to the hearts of all of us that I really have not the courage to object. I do think, however, that we are embarking upon a practice which may prove a little embarrassing hereafter and that we will be asked to establish Mother's Day, Father's Day, and many another day, so that after a while we will be requiring the President to issue proclamations frequently during the year. Up to this time Thanksgiving has been the only great national holiday for which the President has issued proclamations and I think it might be well if that situation had continued.

Mr. DYER. And if the gentleman will permit, they may follow this by asking for holidays.

Mr. REED of New York. No; that will not follow. I want to say that I concur in everything the gentleman from Illinois has said. We had all of that up before our committee and this is not for the purpose of providing a holiday, but many national organizations and splendid organizations all over the country urge this and the President issued a proclamation on May 1 of this year, before this resolution could be passed. He is evidently in sympathy with it and our committee intends to avoid the holiday proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 184) designating May 1 as Child Health Day

Whereas the quality of the adult citizenry of a country depends upon the opportunities for wholesome development provided in childhood; and

Whereas in order to secure such well-rounded development it is essential that provision be made for a year-round child health program; and

Whereas the concentration of the public mind on the necessity of such a year-round program can be effectively achieved by setting aside one day for this purpose as "Child Health Day": Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the Government officials to display the United States flag on all Government buildings and the people of the United States to display the flag at their homes or other suitable places on May 1 of each year, in order to awaken the people of our country to the fundamental necessity of a year-round program looking toward the protection and the development of the physical and the mental health of our children.

SEC. 2. That May 1 shall hereafter be designated and known as May Day Child Health Day and that it shall be the duty of the President to request its observance as provided in this resolution.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, strike out the preamble.

Page 2, line 1, after the word "issue," insert the word "annually," and after the word "proclamation" strike out everything and substitute the following: "setting apart May 1 of each year as Child Health Day and inviting all agencies and organizations interested in child welfare to unite upon that day in the observance of such exercises as will awaken the people of the Nation to the fundamental necessity of a year-round program for the protection and development of the health of the Nation's children."

Page 2, lines 15 to 18, strike out all of section 2.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL PETROLEUM EXPOSITION AT TULSA, OKLA.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 292) authorizing the President to invite the States of the Union and foreign countries to participate in the Annual International Petroleum Exposition, at Tulsa, Okla., to begin October 20, 1928.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. May I ask the nature of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized to invite annually by proclamation, or in such other manner as he may deem proper, the States of the Union and all foreign countries to participate in the proposed International Petroleum Exposition, to be held annually at Tulsa, Okla., beginning October 20, 1928, for the purpose of exhibiting samples of fabricated and raw products of all countries and bringing together buyers and sellers for promotion of trade and commerce in such products used in the petroleum industry.

SEC. 2. Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, how far has the bill progressed? It has been read for information, has it not?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I shall not object, but I want to serve notice, if I may, that bills of this kind should go to the Committee on Ways and Means. The essential thing here is the entry into the United States of articles which are subject to tariff duties.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The essential thing is the exportation of goods to foreign countries.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. These bills have usually gone to the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We are trying to sell goods, not to import them. This is the purpose of the exposition.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not object, Mr. Speaker, but I wanted to make this remark.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADDRESS OF HON. BUTLER B. HARE

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by my colleague [Mr. HARE] over the radio on farm produce agency act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Speaker, under the permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by my colleague Hon. BUTLER B. HARE, over the radio on the farm produce agency act:

THE FARM PRODUCE AGENCY ACT

Friends, it has been suggested that in my talk this evening my remarks be directed primarily for the benefit of fruit and truck growers of the country, as well as those farmers engaged in selling other perishable farm crops on consignment or through commission merchants. It is suggested further that I explain the operations of what is known as the farm produce act, or more commonly referred to as the antidumping act. I assume that these suggestions were made for the reason that I happen to be the author of the act referred to.

This law, which was enacted and became a law only last year, provides that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation receiving fruits, vegetables, poultry products, or any perishable farm product in interstate commerce on behalf of another, without good and sufficient cause, to destroy, or abandon, discard as refuse, or dump any such produce, either directly or indirectly, or through collusion with any person. It provides further that it shall be unlawful for a person to knowingly and intentionally make a false report or statement to the person or association from whom any such produce was received, concerning the handling, condition, quality, sale, or disposition, and any person who shall make such a false report or who intentionally fails to make proper accounting shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punishable by a fine of not less than $100 or more than $3,000, or imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or both within the discretion of the court. Of course, a certificate from a duly authorized representative of the Government to the effect that such produce was in such condition as to render it unsalable or unfit for use will be evidence to show that the conduct of the consignee was in good faith.

The introduction of the bill in Congress two years ago was prompted from the numerous complaints coming from shippers to the effect that they had made consignments of melons, cucumbers, cantaloupes, peaches, etc., and so very often they would receive notice from consignees that the produce was received in bad condition and in many cases would state that it had to be dumped, and sometimes the consignee would ask the shipper for a remittance to pay freight. In such cases the farmer would not know whether or not the real facts had been reported and he had no way of finding out. In many cases the farmer felt that he had been robbed of the entire shipment by an unscrupulous commission merchant and that he had little or no redress. The practice became so prevalent that it was almost impossible for honest and reliable men to stay in business, especially from the standpoint of the shipper. I recall a particular case in my district in 1926, where two neighbors gathered beans in adjoining fields one morning, one having 8 hampers and the other 12. They shipped them by express on the same train and forwarded them to the same market but to different merchants. They received reports the same day indicating that sales were made on the same day. One received net returns to the amount of $3.75 per hamper, whereas the other received notice that the beans were in such bad condition that they had to be dumped, and the commission merchant requested that the shipper forward 80 cents per hamper to pay the express.

The purpose of the law is, of course, to prevent such practices and to protect the shipper as well as the honest and reliable commission merchant.

The power to enforce this act is lodged with the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Justice, and whenever a shipper has good and sufficient reasons to believe that a consignee has made a false report with reference to a shipment, complaint should be made direct to the Secretary of Agriculture, giving in detail as near as possible all the facts in the case as well as the grounds on which his suspicions are based. The department will then make an investigation, and if there is sufficient evidence to warrant prosecution the case will be turned over to the Department of Justice to be handled as it would handle the prosecution in other matters.

My understanding is that the law has been received with practically no objections whatever on the part of the honest and more reliable commission men, and the producers throughout the country seem to think that it will be a great protection to them and often refer to it as one of the greatest pieces of constructive legislation in recent years.

Of course, its success will depend largely upon the cooperation of both the shipper and receiver with the departments charged with the enforcement of the law. In the first place the shipper should give careful attention toward perfecting a standard pack for each crop grown and handled. For example, containers for asparagus, cucumbers, peaches, apples, etc., should be of a standard size and uniform make, and they should be made of a more or less uniform material. That is, the pack for each should be uniform and standardized. Then there should be proper and uniform grading, coupled with expert inspection so that the purchaser or consignee may know in advance exactly what he is going to receive and what he is going to sell.

This should result not only in better prices to the shipper for his products but should add strength and stability to the commission business which should result in lower commission rates and absolute fair dealing on the part of those engaged in the business. If this is accomplished, shippers should receive better returns for their crops and at the same time, consumers would receive their fruits and vegetables at lower prices. Of course, this latter statement is based upon the assumption that the receivers are going to conform not only to the letter, but to the spirit of the law. In this connection, I might refer to a practice on the part of some commission men that should be discontinued. For instance, it is charged that some concerns send their representatives to a shipping point during the harvesting season where they will buy outright as many carloads as possible and at the same time secure as many as possible to be shipped on consignment. Then when the cars or shipments purchased and those shipped on consignment arrive at their destination at the same time, the receiver will hold the consignment off the market until those purchased outright are sold in order to prevent the produce of the shipper, received upon consignment, coming into competition with the produce purchased. This is unfair both to the consignor and the consumer, because the latter is required to purchase in a market where the supply is limited and therefore pay higher price, and the shipper's produce is delayed a day or more and by reason of the deterioration in the meantime brings a lower price when sold, than it would have brought had it been placed on the market when fresh.

The next important and logical step to be taken by the Government in connection with this work is to make ample and suitable provision for inspection of all carlot shipments of fruits and vegetables, as well as other perishable farm products at original shipping points. This will be a protection and benefit to both the shipper, the commission merchant, and the consumer as well.

PERIOD OF RESTRICTIONS, FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement made by me before the House Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by me before the House Committee on Indian Affairs on March 29, 1928:

Mr. Chairman and fellow members of the committee, it is with a degree of hesitancy that I appear in opposition to this bill, H. R. 12000. This room is filled with lawyers and older Members of Congress who have been dealing with Indian affairs for many years, while I have been here only four months. So I hope I will be permitted to make a short uninterrupted statement, after which I shall gladly answer questions, if I can do so. I come to you fresh from the people with a gilt-edged statement of fact, with sound reasoning and a plea that the voice of the people might be heard.

First, I wish to remind you that the bureau's star witness, Hon. Mr. CRAMTON, from Michigan, based his argument for the merits of this bill on the grounds that Hon. C. D. Carter was for it, and gave that as his outstanding reason why the bill should pass. My honorable colleague seems to be laboring under the impression that Mr. Carter is still a Member of Congress, but I stand before you to-day as absolute proof that he is not. It so happens that I defeated him in the last campaign in a three-cornered race on this very issue. Since Mr. CRAMTON seems to be so ill-informed on this fact, it is barely possible that he is not so well acquainted with the Indian situation in Oklahoma as he would have you believe. However, in justice to Mr. CRAMTON, I wish to say that we should not expect a gentleman from Michigan to thoroughly understand a condition in so distant a State as Oklahoma.

I will admit that it was generally conceded that Mr. Carter was the representative of the wishes of the Choctaws and Chickasaws; not only this, but on account of his long tenure in office, he was looked to as the chief spokesman of all the Indians in Oklahoma, and also had much influence in regard to other tribes in the United States, before Congress and the Indian Bureau. But he introduced a bill to restrict 80 acres of homestead land 16 years beyond the period agreed upon. The chamber of commerce of his own home town passed resolutions condemning him for introducing such a bill. I was running for Congress. Both Indians and whites wanted to know how I stood. My course was marked out for me. I was against the bill. This issue and the only issue between us was clear cut and definite. The people spoke and to-day I am in Congress. It was not my intention to bring in this political phase of the question but Mr. CRAMTON'S argument made it necessary.

As for the Choctaws and Chickasaws I wish to say that they are tired of bureaucratic government. They feel that they have been unjustly treated and their money used to keep up schools, tribal officers, etc., while many of the deserving Indians are almost at the point of starvation. They have not received a penny from the bureau for years, although they have coal and asphalt lands that pour thousands of dollars into the Treasury each year. They beg to be free from this rule, to have their affairs wound up and be allowed to live as other citizens. They argue that as long as they are under restrictions their money will be used to keep up fat-salaried officers and the bureau will continue to operate in order to hold jobs for those in authority, while the Indians realize no benefit whatsoever. I wish to say that so earnest is their plea for a winding up of their affairs that only last week they assembled in convention in my district, four or five hundred strong to protest against this bureaucratic treatment and to send delegates up here to aid in a final settlement.

There is also a belief that many of the Indians have been victims of an unsympathetic attitude on the part of the bureau in dealing with their personal problems, an attitude that dulls the initiative of these people in any attempts to solve their own problems of life. These Indians are not an ignorant class of people. They vote and they hold office. Those who may be classed as incompetent by the bureau, as a rule, have educated children who are fully capable of taking care of their own affairs and those of their parents.

Outside of Oklahoma the general public is not aware of the true state of affairs. They see many pictures of Indians in fancy costumes posed in photos for publicity; they hear how wealthy and improvident the Indians are; they read that the bureau is civilizing, educating, and protecting the Indians. This is not true of the Five Civilized Tribes. I have never heard of a member of one of these tribes wearing a blanket. In my district the Indians, as well as the whites, feel that they are suffering from too much class legislation instigated through the channels of the bureau, wherein the Indian rights of property are jeopardized and their welfare as useful citizens endangered.

Under the Atoka agreement the Indians were guaranteed a full and complete settlement of their affairs. This settlement included a sale of all tribal property, and that has not been carried out. Furthermore, it was a fixed belief with both whites and Indians that 21 years after Statehood the restrictions would be removed and the land would become taxable. They now believe the time is fast approaching to properly adjust these matters in a way mutually satisfactory to all concerned, and any attempt to prolong restrictions beyond 1931 is frowned upon.

Gentlemen of the committee, from Oklahoma's standpoint this is a far-reaching measure. One-third of the Indians in the United States live in Oklahoma and 84 per cent of the Indian population in this State have their homes in eastern Oklahoma, the country of the Five Civilized Tribes. My district is the home of two of these five tribes. Only one other Congressman on this committee, Mr. HOWARD, has any of these Indians. He has a part of the Cherokees. Therefore, I am more affected by this bill than any member of the committee, or any Member of Congress, and I feel that what I have to say should have some weight.

These restrictions not only affect the welfare of the Indians, but are also felt in the social and economic progress of the whole surrounding body politic. In this connection I wish to read to you some samples of the great avalanche of mail that has been coming to my office since I have taken my seat in Congress.

(The letters referred to are as follows:)

SULPHUR, OKLA., December 28, 1928.

Mr. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
Member United States Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CARTWRIGHT: We are at this time wishing to determine the attitude and opinion of our Representatives in the National Congress as to the validity of the acts of said Congress, in setting at naught the plain terms of the Atoka agreement, by which acts of abrogation the final settlement of tribal affairs have been and are still being hindered.

Said Atoka agreement guaranteed to the tribes a full and complete settlement of their affairs, and this settlement included the sale of all tribal property, coal lands included. It also guaranteed to the tribes the abolition of our tribal schools. We are also being taxed to maintain the schools set up under our State form of government. Clearly a form of double taxation, upon a class that is the least able to endure it. And are submitting to it only because of inability to help ourselves.

We believe the time has come to properly adjust these matters in a way mutually satisfactory to all concerned, and are appealing to your sense of justice and fair play, to see that some effort is made at this session of Congress to bring about a final settlement of the affairs of our people, according to the terms of the Atoka agreement.

May I have an expression of your opinion upon this vital issue?

Believe me to be, sir, cordially yours,

A. A. ALDRICH,
Member of Chickasaw Tribe.

MARCH 20, 1928.

Hon. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Although I am not a resident of your district, I want to commend you for your fight to remove the restrictions of the Five Tribes, feeling that in doing this service for the Indians of your district you will eventually serve every tribe in the State, also the various localities interested in the Indian problem.

I was in the Indian Service for several years; and viewing the situation from every angle of my experience, with special consideration for the Indian and his welfare, I believe the present policy is a sad detriment instead of a benefit to the Indian, and it is my opinion that the unrestricted Indian as a tribe will make more progress in

5 years than in the past 20. In our efforts to help the Indian and make him a self-supporting citizen we have perpetuated his early environments, and instead of self-reliance and thrift he has learned dependence and indolence, through no fault of his own, and as the younger generation comes on we are forcing upon him the customs of his father.

I know Mr. Howard to be a hard and sincere worker for what he believes is right, and I trust you have his valuable assistance in your fight.

With very best wishes, I am,

Yours very truly,

PRESTON R. CALVERT,
Attorney, Pawnee, Okla.

ENID, OKLA., March 19, 1928.

Mr. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We are watching your fight for justice on the Indian-settlement question.

You need not waste energy on the per cent of Oklahoma's obligation to the Indian; that will soon be fulfilled, and this State will back you in a demand that any further tax exemption for the Indian must be borne in full by the National Government.

The people of Oklahoma pay their share of all national taxes and owe no apology to the Nation for demanding a square deal for the taxpayer as well as the Indian.

Yours truly,

T. H. STAGGS,
Farmer and Banker, Enid, Okla.

HUGO, OKLA., March 18, 1928.

Hon. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to commend you for your stand on Indian affairs. In regard to your policy in winding up the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, I think that most of the people who came to Oklahoma 20 to 25 years ago, and have made Oklahoma what it is, believe that by the time 1931 rolls around the Indians have had ample time to become citizens and that they should be turned loose and be made to help bear the burden of taxation.

Of course, the Federal job holders will always argue that they should be protected forever, so that they can still hold their jobs. You can rest assured that the best interests of the country in your district are with you on this issue, and we are hoping that you will win out.

With kindest regards, I am, very truly yours,

C. D. NEASE,
President Nease Timber Co.

SOPER, OKLA., March 17, 1928.

Hon. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the removal of restrictions, it is my opinion that the parties wanting an extension of restrictions are those who are on the pay roll and receiving the pie, and maybe some others who hope to get on the pay roll, and none other. If they could get another 25-year extension of restrictions, they would want another like period.

I have talked to almost every full blood and those of less blood who are yet restricted, down in this part of the country, and they all want the restrictions removed to a man and woman. The fact is, the tribal funds are not going to their benefit, but to pay the numerous hundreds of salaried employees.

Taxes are out of reason, as you know. I handle real estate and find that worlds of people are disinterested in locating and investing in Oklahoma property just on account of high taxation, and they all inquire as to when the restricted lands become taxable. Oklahoma is seriously hampered on account of the restricted lands, and every honest man knows and will admit it.

Hoping that you will be able to see that the restrictions are removed as previously arranged, and with best wishes, I am,

Very truly yours,

E. J. NORWOOD.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Here is one from a classmate of mine, who is assistant attorney general of Oklahoma:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., March 17, 1928.

Hon. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR WILBURN: As a member of the Chickasaw Tribe, I desire to convey to you and the other Members of Congress my opposition to the extension of the restrictions which have heretofore been imposed upon the members of the Five Civilized Tribes.

As you know, most all of the old citizens have long since departed this life and the younger members of the tribes have had ample opportunity to secure educational qualifications which permit them to transact business the same as other citizens.

In addition to this, as you know, so long as Congress continues the handling of the affairs of the Indians as it has in the past, thousands of unnecessary positions are continued and additional ones created and the funds belonging to the Indians will soon be dissipated.

It would be impossible for me to convey in a letter the many urgent reasons for the closing up of the affairs of our people. It seems to me that the members of the tribes should bear their portion of the burden of government and pay taxes on their property. Although I have not been required to pay taxes under the laws of Oklahoma and the treaties made between the United States Government and my tribe, I have been paying taxes upon my property since I attained my majority.

I shall be very glad to appear before the committee in Washington in opposition to the extension of restrictions if you desire.

With kind personal regards and best wishes, I am,

Your friend,

W. C. LEWIS,
Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. MCVAY. What degree of blood is he?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I could not tell you.

Mr. MCVAY. He is a white man, is he not?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. He is a breed. I wish to remind you gentlemen of the committee that from Oklahoma's standpoint this is a far-reaching measure. One-third of the Indians in the United States live in Oklahoma and 84 per cent of the Indian population in this State have their homes in eastern Oklahoma, the country of the Five Civilized Tribes. My district is the home of two of these five tribes. Only one other Congressman on this committee, Mr. HOWARD, has any of these Indians. He has a part of the Cherokees. Therefore, I am more affected by this bill than any member of the committee, or any Member of Congress, and I feel that what I have to say should have some weight.

Now, gentlemen, this bill is much stronger than the Carter bill. It ties up matters for 25 years longer instead of 16 years. It exempts 160 acres of homestead lands instead of 80 acres, as in the Carter bill. Under it the department will continue to use the Indian funds to pay the salaries of tribal officers such as these sitting around me. I have no grievance against these gentlemen; they are splendid fellows. But when these Indians are begging and pleading to be free from these restrictions, and are so earnest in their plea that they caused the defeat of one of their own flesh and blood because he introduced a similar bill, surely you will not make the mistake of allowing this bill to pass.

This Government is committed to a policy of winding up tribal affairs, and if they are ever to be wound up, their schools must be disposed of, the tribal properties must be sold, and the machinery of their tribal government must cease. I believe there is a State rights question involved in the further restriction of these Indians. In accepting the enabling act the State of Oklahoma agreed to the 21-year exemption period, and soon will have fulfilled this agreement. Will this Congress force the State of Oklahoma to accept another 25-year exemption period with the resulting loss of taxes?

There is only one way I could look upon this bill with favor and that is to amend it to apply to incompetent full bloods only, reimburse the State of Oklahoma for the loss of taxes, discontinue all schools and officials maintained by tribal funds as soon as the present legal cases are disposed of, and abolish the branch Indian office at Muskogee. The few Indians thus affected could easily be taken care of through the Washington office, the State of Oklahoma reimbursed, and the members of the Five Civilized Tribes would receive the full per capita payments due them. But in its present form this bill is impossible.

Mr. SPROUL. In the event of the tribal government being discontinued and all the property allotted, and the money paid out to the members of the tribe, would you be willing to obligate, as far as you are concerned, the State of Oklahoma to take complete charge of these Indians and release the Government from any obligation that it might have to the Indians?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I do not say that I would.

Mr. SPROUL. Why not? You are urging that the Government take that attitude and turn them over and all their properties.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I said some things that are debatable. That is true. But I am giving you the sentiment that does exist down there and that this committee ought to have. No. I think the Government should have some say with the incompetent, full-blood Indian. That is my position.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. In answer to the gentleman's question, I will suggest that the State of Oklahoma is to-day doing most of those things. They will cite you that appropriation of $2,000,000 on all the activities of the Indians, when that is a very small thing as compared with the yearly burden placed upon the State of Oklahoma by reason of these Indians.

Mr. SPROUL. Do you know the amount of tax that comes to the State from oil on Indian lands, from Indian sources and others?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The approximate production of oil in the State of Oklahoma a day is 600,000 barrels. It would be safe to say that, at least, one-fourth of that is coming from Indian lands. Averaging that oil at $1 a barrel, the 3 per cent gross production cost on 150,000 barrels of oil would amount to $4,500 a day to the State of Oklahoma. That we are being denied the right to collect by reason of the Indian leases, and in lieu of that I am asking this little $10,000,000 with which to educate the children.

Mr. SPROUL. You will admit that all the Osage oil, both tribal and that owned by the operators, pays a tax.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. That is not an argument. I call attention to the fact that every farmer in Oklahoma whose land produces oil pays a 3 per cent production tax, and an ad valorem tax on his farm.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will make the preliminary statement that the gentleman from Oklahoma has made a suggestion, which to one of my temperament is unpleasant, in characterizing me as "the bureau's star witness." I am a Member of Congress, who has made a research on this question, and am a self-starter, and no one's witness. He would know this if he had been here longer.

He has referred to Mr. Carter, whom I mentioned when I appeared before this committee some days ago in reference to this matter. He seems to have the idea that because Mr. Carter was defeated and Mr. CARTWRIGHT was elected, that we might value here less Mr. Carter's judgment or Mr. Carter's experience and integrity. One reason we still have confidence here in Charlie Carter, after he has left the Halls of Congress, one reason that he still exercises here an influence is because we know that Charlie Carter would rather be right than Congressman. He cares enough for the welfare of the Indians that he would retire in the course of his duty rather than to desert them. I wired him the other day because I had used his name, and I wanted him to know that I was not doing so improperly, and told him something of the situation, and I have this telegram in reply, which is the immediate cause of my coming here this morning:

"Answering your wire I have carefully analyzed Leavitt bill, H. R. 12000. While it does not meet the conditions as definitely as should be and imposes burdens beyond actual demands, it meets many immediate necessities and should be passed at this session in order to make possible working out of necessary, definite plan by subsequent legislation. In order to accomplish this it is necessary, of course, to report bill without extraneous amendments calculated to defeat measure. Should purposes of this bill be defeated by embarrassing amendments and these helpless full-blood Indians left at the mercy of scheming grafters, it means that most of the original owners of entire domain in this State will be reduced to penury, beggary, and pauperism, becoming vagabonds within their own domain and a charge and burden upon their State, county, and community for support. The responsibility is upon Congress and specifically the Committee on Indian Affairs to prevent that calamity. Letter follows.

"C. D. CARTER."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I did not mean anything personal and I mentioned Mr. Carter's name with respect, but I wanted the gentleman from Michigan to remember that I am here now. I am aware of his correspondence with Mr. Carter, and I think he might have accorded courtesy enough to have at least mentioned Indian affairs to me.

MISSISSIPP FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I regard the enactment of the flood control act of 1928 as the most constructive piece of legislation written upon our statute books during my five years in Congress. It was a matter of great satisfaction to me that the Congress stood steadfast by the main proposition, namely, that flood control to be effective must be nationalized in the fullest sense of the term. While we yielded to the President on many details, I am glad that Congress stood by its main contention, that the Federal Government assume the total cost and that no local assessments be levied.

I am happy that the President signed the bill, but I am satisfied in my own mind that if he had not done so the Congress would have overridden his veto, so strong was the sentiment in this country and in this Congress for flood control of an effective kind.

The printed hearings of the Flood Control Committee of the House on the Reid bill will show that I took a positive and affirmative stand on this question. When the bill was being debated in the House I participated in that debate, and the following is the statement that I made on the floor of the House on April 18, 1928:

SPEECH OF HON. MEYER JACOBSTEIN IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 18, 1928

I do not want the impression to go forth that the views expressed by some of the members of the New York State delegation, notably Mr. DAVENPORT and Mr. LAGUARDIA, represent the views of the entire New York delegation. I am taking a few minutes of the time of this House to tell you that the sentiment in my district from all classes of people is very strong for flood relief legislation. Furthermore, the people of my district do not agree to the proposition of local assessments. [Applause.] Speaking for myself, I am strongly of the opinion this project should be nationalized in every way, including the financing of the construction and upkeep.

I especially desire to refute the assertion that those of us who are proposing that this entire project be financed by the National Government are basing our conclusion upon mushy sentiment and emotionalism. Our conviction and our position is based on solid common sense and not on mere sentimentality. A few days ago I was talking with one of the most level-headed business men in the city of Rochester, a gentleman who is president of one of our largest industries. In discussing this flood-control proposal I said to him:

How does it happen that you practical-minded business men voted, through your chamber of commerce, to have the Federal Government assume total responsibility for flood relief, including the financial costs?

He smiled and said:

You know when we first went into it we were inclined to be against the assumption by the Federal Government of all the expenditure, and we were guided by the opinion and advice of the chief engineer of our company, who was also in favor of local contributions until he went into the question. Now, after careful reconsideration, we have changed our minds and favor the National Government bearing the burden.

They gave the matter careful consideration. A special committee of the chamber of commerce was appointed, consisting of Joseph Michaels, chairman; Edward G. Miner, vice chairman; John F. Ancona; Charles L. Cadle; Albert B. Eastwood; Edwin A. Fisher; Frank W. Lovejoy; Harper Sibley; and A. E. Soderholm. This special committee studied the flood question conscientiously. Many months after the flood occurred, and after they had had time to give the matter careful thought, this committee recommended that the Federal Government should assume the entire cost and supervise and control the construction of flood-prevention devices. The following is the portion of the report approved by the special committee and trustees of the Rochester Chamber of Commerce:

On recommendation of a special committee under chairmanship of Joseph Michaels, appointed recently by Edward A. Halbleib, president of the chamber, to study the referendum, the chamber trustees also favored the second proposal of the referendum, declaring that the Federal Government should assume sole responsibility for locating, constructing, and maintaining such works as are necessary to Mississippi flood control.

On the grounds that inadequate appropriations in the past have materially delayed the carrying out of a systematic plan of protection, and that necessary money must be available as needed, the trustees also favored the third proposal of the referendum, to the effect that there should be an adequate appropriation to insure efficient, continuous, and economic work, the funds to be made available as needed.

The plan of administration should be centralized, in the opinion of Rochester chamber trustees, and a carefully formed organization adapted to carrying on and completing a project of such proportions.

The organization should be vested with ample power for the necessary research and have full discretion in all matters of engineering, operation, and maintenance. This view was incorporated in their favorable vote on the fourth proposal of the referendum, which stated:

"The committee recommends that flood control of the Mississippi River should be dealt with in legislation and administration on its own merits, separate and distinct from any other undertaking."

There is no emotionalism in this. It is good business and I will tell you why.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. In a moment I will be glad to yield—after I have finished my preliminary statement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman referred to my district and I think he should yield.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I think I can show that in the gentleman's own district the United States Chamber of Commerce took a similar view, as expressed in the results of a referendum, a printed copy of which I hold in my hand.

Mr. LAGUARDIA (interposing). Will the gentleman yield on the matter of the chamber of commerce?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I will yield in just a minute. I figured out while sitting here this afternoon that in New York State alone 41 communities went on record as favoring national control, national supervision, and national assumption of all the costs. One hundred and twenty industrial organizations in New York State, including many industrial organizations in New York City——

Mr. LAGUARDIA (interposing). Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. In just one minute, and then I will yield. The statement was made here this afternoon by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] that he did not trust the judgment of the chamber of commerce any more, since they came out on the tax question against the President. Well, on the matter of taxation I can understand how a selfish motive might have crept in. The men who are doing the big corporate business of the country want tax reduction. In that connection there might be a selfish interest. Of course, they want as large a reduction as they can secure consistent with safety to the Treasury. But how can you say any selfish motive can creep into this flood-relief proposition?

I can see no selfishness in their position, and I hold no brief for the chamber of commerce of any city. I do believe, however, that on this question they were moved by the same natural sympathy and the same patriotism that moves the rest of us in favoring this proposed legislation.

I referred to the action of the United States Chamber of Commerce and the referenda vote of local chambers all over my State because this vote supports the position taken by the special committee of the Rochester Chamber of Commerce months before.

When public hearings were held on this pending legislation I appeared before the Flood Control Committee and presented the views of our local chamber of commerce. I was especially glad to learn that their position was an indorsement of my own previously expressed views.

I am emphasizing the attitude of the business man in order to refute the false notion that we who are supporting this Reid bill are motivated by a maudlin sentiment. This is a most unfair accusation. In fact, the business man has good reasons for looking upon this measure as being very sound from a practical viewpoint. These practical-minded men of large affairs, including captains of industry, bankers, engineers, know full well that the only way to effectively prevent a similar flood in the future is to have the entire project controlled and financed by the Federal Government. They know, as we know, that it was a narrow and piecemeal system of handling the proposition during the last half century that caught us unprepared when this flood broke upon the people and the land in the Mississippi Valley.

They believe and have said that divided responsibility has lead to divided control as well as ineffective control of flood-prevention measures. As business men they said it is better to invest 20 per cent more and get full returns on the investment. If you are going to invest $80 and get something only half done let us invest $100 and do it right. That is a sound business proposition. That is the thing which appealed to the business men. It was not maudlin sentiment and it was not emotionalism, and yet in the first instance they, like the rest of us, were naturally in full sympathy with those who suffered property and life destruction in that flooded area. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to say that the open-shop, labor-exploiting, antisoldier-bonus, and pro-Mellon chambers of commerce do not speak for the workingmen of my district, and I will tell the gentleman from Rochester now that they do not represent the people who elected and voted for him—the working people of Rochester.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Well, that is a very nice speech.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And it is true, and it will come home to the gentleman if he is going to cater to the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I want to say to the gentleman from New York, my personal friend—and you will notice I exhibit no emotionalism in the discussion of this problem—that I am catering to no one. I am merely stating facts—cold, hard facts, which refute the charge made that those who favor this legislation are moved by maudlin sentiment. I say again I am catering to no group.

Mr. LAGUARDIA (interposing). The gentleman will when he supports the chamber of commerce as against the tailors of Rochester.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I am willing to give credit to any organization when it is doing the right thing in the right way, and I do not care who knows it. [Applause.] I presume if I were actuated by political expediency I would not even quote the United States Chamber of Commerce. But I am not so narrow as to deny that a chamber of commerce can be actuated by sound and patriotic motives.

When this flood broke out and damaged this district I asked the War Department to send an engineer to Rochester in order to discuss the flood situation. We discussed the flood situation in Rochester in an open meeting. After we had discussed the proposition fully I said to the people of my district that so far as I was concerned it looked to me as though the time had come when the National Government should assume full responsibility. I stated then and state now that the National Government neglected its duty in the past and that we should now embark on a new policy—a national policy. I took this position before Congress convened last December. I stated my position before the chamber of commerce had taken any action. Therefore it might be said that the chamber of commerce indorsed my views and were catering to me, rather than the reverse, as suggested by my friend from New York City.

I always tell the voters of my district exactly what is involved in every proposition, and that is why I think a Republican district has sent me back here three times; and if I do run again I will take my chances with the same voters, I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. I am not afraid to stand here and say a good word for the chamber of commerce just because they happen to be on the right side of the question and agree with my own views.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield for one more question on the chamber of commerce?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not Mr. Eastman, of the Eastman Kodak Co., control the Chamber of Commerce of Rochester?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Eastman is one of our finest, ablest, and wealthiest citizens. As a matter of fact, Mr. Eastman happens to be in Africa on a hunting trip, and was not in this country when the chamber took action on flood control. Please take notice the men I am defending are Republicans. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANSFIELD. A Democrat needs no defense.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Eastman is a Republican.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the Eastman Kodak Co. any interests down in the Mississippi Valley?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Of course it has. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. What interest has the Eastman Kodak Co. in the flooded area? This is a very pertinent question. Every business man in the United States has an interest in that flooded area. Every business man should be interested in maintaining all sections of our country in a prosperous and happy condition. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, the first letters that came to me after the flood came from manufacturers in my district who suddenly discovered that their sales had fallen off in the flooded areas.

Now the gentleman from New York assumes in his argument that only the business men of my district are for flood control and flood relief. He is mistaken. The workers of my district are moved by the same compassion and the same patriotism that moves every Congressman on this floor. Does not the gentleman from New York know that organized labor, through the American Federation of Labor, has indorsed this bill? Does he not know that the farmers, through their organizations, have publicly indorsed this legislative proposal? The American Legion has also gone on record, through its officials, as being in favor of this flood-control legislation.

In fact, I have still to find any large group of people, organized or unorganized, which does not agree with me on this proposition. I believe the American people want this measure enacted into law. I hope the bill will pass the House and be approved by the President. There may be details here and there that need amending. The bill can be perfected. But I hope the big, essential feature remains unamended—that the project be controlled absolutely by the Federal Government, with no local assessments against the local communities, but the Federal Government bearing the entire cost. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one more minute.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. In a moment. The business men in my district, not necessarily speaking for the chamber of commerce, were for flood control by national expenditure, because they knew from actual experience in dealing with the people of this flooded area that this country is wrapped up in the welfare of the district that was devastated by this flood. This is an answer to the question, "What interest in this matter has the Eastman Kodak Co.?" Every individual, every farmer, and every business is a part of this country, and we should do all we can to maintain its prosperity.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SUNDAY, May 13, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. ASWELL, Speaker pro tempore.

Dr. Frank W. Collier, of the American University, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, in Thy tender mercy help us to find comfort and strength in Thee in the hour when our loved ones depart from this life, leaving us desolate. Death seems so ruthless, giving no heed to our suffering hearts; and so we look upon it as an enemy, the last enemy we have to face, terrible in its mien. But help us, Merciful Father, to be mindful of the fact that we see death only from the side of our present experience and that there is another side, the side beyond the tomb. It is because of the veil that shuts from us the view of the other life that we mourn. Help us to pierce the veil with the eye of faith and thus get the glorious vision of the larger life of which death is but the gate.

Thou knowest our frame; Thou rememberest that we are dust. So we pray that those who were bound to our brother by the ties of blood may realize that the Everlasting Arms are beneath them and that their dead are safe in the hands of the Eternal God who is their dwelling place. May they be comforted with Thy great truth.

Bless, our Heavenly Father, these coworkers in the public service of our departed brother, who have come here at this hour to render their homage to his memory. We thank Thee for these public servants who, like our brother, in serving their country are rendering service to us all. Help us to appreciate their service. And help us all so to live that when our summons comes we may hear the blessed words of our Lord Jesus Christ, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." In His name we pray. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the reading of the Journal will be deferred until to-morrow.

There was no objection.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES ON HON. LADISLAS LAZARO

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, May 13, 1928, at 12 o'clock m., be set apart for memorial exercises in commemoration of the life, services, and character of the late Hon. LADISLAS LAZARO, former Representative from the seventh district of Louisiana.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions:

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 204

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tribute to the memory of Hon. LADISLAS LAZARO, late a Member of this House from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. DE ROUEN. Mr. Speaker, we assemble to-day to evidence our respect for, and pay tribute to, one who served with distinction to himself and honor to his State.

When those we love are snatched away,
By death's relentless hand,
Our hearts the mournful tribute pay,
That friendship must demand.

On March 30, 1927, Dr. LADISLAS LAZARO, a Member of Congress from the seventh congressional district of Louisiana, died. He was born June 5, 1872, on the old Lazaro plantation near Ville Platte. He was the only child of Alexandre Lazaro and Marie Denise Ortego. His father died when he was only a few years old, at which time his mother moved to Ville Platte, La. He was born into that stratum of life, which elsewhere is called the middle class, but which in this country is so universal as to make of other classes a negligible quantity. He was neither very rich nor poor, neither proud nor humble; he knew no hunger that he was not sure of satisfying and of no luxury which enervates mind or body. His parents were sober, God-fearing, intelligent, and upright, without pretension and without humility. He grew up in a company of boys like himself—wholesome, honest, and self-respecting. They looked down on no one, and they never felt it possible for anyone to look down on them. Their houses were homes of probity, piety, and patriotism. They learned in the admirable readers of 50 years ago the lessons of the heroic and splendid lives that have come down through the ages. They read in their weekly newspapers the story of the world's progress, in which they were eager to take part, and of the sins and wrongs of civilization against which they were eager to battle. It was a serious and thoughtful time, and the boys of that day felt dimly but deeply that days of keen struggle and high achievements were before them. Under such influences and 'midst such environments Dr. LADISLAS LAZARO was reared and educated.

Dr. LADISLAS LAZARO was educated in the private and public schools of Imperial St. Landry Parish, and he attended Holy Cross College at New Orleans, La. He was graduated in medicine in 1894, and followed his chosen profession, in which he was benevolent, charitable, and conscientious. He was a member and president of the St. Landry School Board for four years. He was elected to the Louisiana State Senate in 1908 and 1912, both times without opposition. Then he was elected to the Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses and reelected to the Sixty-sixth, Sixty-seventh, Sixty-eighth, Sixty-ninth, and Seventieth Congresses without opposition.

A man possessing the qualities with which nature had endowed LADISLAS LAZARO invariably seeks political activities as naturally as a growing plant seeks light and air. He was endowed with a wholesome ambition, a rare power of making and holding friends, a faith which may be called religious in his country and institution, and flowing from this a sincere belief that a man could do no nobler work than to serve his State and country. He had a divine gift of sympathy which made all men his friends. He was very faithful and punctual in little things and attended to the most minute details of his office as well as the major problems with promptness and precision. These were the elements in his noble character which drew him irresistibly into public life and kept him there.

It touches my heart deeply to speak of the life of so dear a friend and chum as was LADISLAS LAZARO. His years were not many, but they were years of happy childhood; years of studious and ambitious young manhood; years of deliberate, conscientious, matured manhood; years of happiness, gratitude, unselfishness, and loyalty to his friends and family; and years of consecreated devotion to his duty and his constituents. Well do I remember his boyhood days when he and I attended the little school in Ville Platte, our games of marbles and baseball, our pets, our friends, and lessons. As we grew up together we ever remained the best and truest of friends, and I noticed more and more his tender sweetness, and his overwhelming and ever-increasing love for his mother and family. He was a devoted son and the idol of his mother's heart, and regardless of how busy he was, he always found time to write her and visit her regularly at the old home plantation. He was a faithful husband, a loving father, and those who knew him intimately knew how proud he was of his family and how he was completely wrapped up in their future and well-being. He was an exemplary citizen and an active, honest, and upright public servant.

I weep, LADISLAS LAZARO is no more, but
Thou hast taken thy lamp and gone to bed;
I stay a little longer, as one stays
To cover up the embers that still burn.

Mr. WILSON, of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, our deceased colleague Hon. LADISLAS LAZARO was a native Louisianian. The place of his birth is near Ville Platte, now in the parish of Evangeline, formerly a portion of the parish of St. Landry, and there also is his last resting place.

He was educated in public and private schools in St. Landry Parish and at St. Isadore's College in the city of New Orleans. He then completed his medical course and selected the practice of medicine as his chosen profession.

As a physician he was successful in an unusual degree and was among the leaders in his State in that profession, which is second to none in usefulness and service.

In his long record of public service he still maintained an intense interest in and kept in touch with the progress of the medical profession. With all the honors that came to him he was still proud to be known and termed "Doctor LAZARO."

In every walk of life, in every calling, and in every home, whether a palace or an humble cottage, the doctor is an important personality. To him is intrusted the most important phases of life; his advice and counsel are controlling in respect to those things that determine the most vital issues of life. As has been well said:

Real physicians are daily forced to confront problems, and the right solution of them tends toward their best and noblest qualities.

When we think of the countless deeds of kindness and mercy that the real doctors do, in all their years, unselfishly in the name of charity—sweet charity; we ponder these things in our heart, if in a better world than this there is a crown of a little more jewels than others, it surely is in keeping for the faithful doctor's brow.

Congressman LAZARO as a citizen was devoted to every movement for the upbuilding of his parish and State. He took an active interest in public education. He served as president of the School Board of St. Landry Parish and was an important factor in advancing the cause of public education there. As a member of the State Senate of Louisiana he also rendered signal service in that movement that has made the public-school system of Louisiana one of the most effective and advanced among the Southern States.

As a public servant he was diligent and constructive. He was a man of great industry and took unusual pains to know definitely the details of all the legislative measures upon which he was called to pass judgment. Few men in Congress were so well posted in this respect, and for this reason his advice and counsel were sought and followed by many. His record in Congress, as elsewhere, was one of effective service. If actual accomplishments on behalf of the public may be accepted as the proper definition of statesmanship, then our colleague was a statesman.

It is said that the greatest asset a man in public life may have is the confidence of those whom he serves and of those with whom he comes in contact in the execution of his public duties. Congressman LAZARO possessed this quality as have few men with whom I have had the honor to serve in a public way. His personality inspired confidence and his conduct retained confidence.

Success in business or professional life is worthy and entitled to praise. Success in public life is admired and applauded. Yet the real and final measure of the achievements that mean most to the individual himself and upon which rests the safety of the social fabric and the ultimate stability of all government is the successful building of the home and the development of the family as a unit of civilization.

Those of us who had the good fortune to know Doctor LAZARO intimately realized that his chief pride and interest as well as his complete devotion was at all times centered about the welfare of his devoted wife, his loving daughters, and his affectionate son. The chief source of his happiness was in the fact that they had always met his expectations in every way and that the plans he had made for their training, advancement, and happiness were working out to complete realization of his fondest hopes.

This home, this family circle, with its thoughtful love and consideration each for the other, is a most interesting example of what in fact is the true test of the most successful career.

As a friend I loved Doctor LAZARO; as a man I admired him; as a legislator I respected him; as a counselor I profited by his advice. All those who knew him will be glad to say that his was—

A life worth knowing about for those with ideals; a life worth study by those who are sincere.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the life and character of Doctor LAZARO.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, our lamented colleague Dr. LADISLAS LAZARO died in this city a little more than a year ago, but the memory of this good man, splendid citizen, conscientious and painstaking legislator, loving husband and father, and true friend will abide with us during life.

He was the dean of the Louisiana delegation—a position for which he was most eminently fitted. He had the love and confidence of the entire Louisiana delegation, and his unassuming manner and quiet dignity inspired the respect of his colleagues. He represented the seventh congressional district of Louisiana for seven uninterrupted terms and had been reelected without opposition to his eighth term, when he was called from his legislative duties by a sudden and untimely death.

His long and continuous service is easily explained. He was tireless in his service to the people he so ably represented. He knew nearly every voter in his district. He had a large individual following and numbered his friends among both the rich and the poor. The most trivial matter touching his legislative duties received his prompt attention, and legislation affecting his district and State was given the closest study and the most studious consideration. He loved his party, but he loved his people more. He had the independence and the manhood to vote for that which was to the best interest of his constituents, even though that vote was not in accord with his party associates.

Doctor LAZARO was an ornament to the profession of which he was a member. Previous to his election to Congress he was a country doctor, but his ability and skill as a physician was recognized over the entire State. He made a financial sacrifice when he came to Congress and gave up the practice of his profession. Professionally, he inspired the same confidence here as he did at home, and his services and advice were frequently sought by his colleagues and their families.

The death of Doctor LAZARO was a great personal loss to me. We represented adjoining districts in Louisiana, and our interests with reference to legislative matters were much alike. We thus consulted frequently with each other and acted together on matters affecting the welfare of our people. I soon learned to respect and rely on his sound judgment. The friendship thus formed soon became very intimate, and his death was to me a personal bereavement, as I lost a true, tried, and trusted friend.

Doctor LAZARO left a wife, three daughters, and a son. His wife vied with her husband in popularity in congressional circles. His daughters, happily married, are noted for their physical beauty and intellectual grace. His son, still under age, is studious and ambitious and will follow in the footsteps of his distinguished father and become a member of the medical profession.

It has been said that the best test of a man's character is the love he inspires in his own household. Measured by this test Doctor LAZARO was one of nature's noblemen. The man was loved wherever he was known. No greater tribute can be paid to the life of a man than the love of the people among whom he lived. The high esteem and affectionate regard in which he was held by his people was demonstrated on the day of his funeral, when all business was suspended and people from all sections of the State congregated at the overflowing church and cemetery to pay a last tribute of love and respect to this distinguished citizen.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, Doctor LAZARO was one of the first to welcome me when I came to Washington. I had not known him before, personally, but with the first warm handclasp I felt for him a genuine friendship which continued firm and constant.

When there was illness in my family I appealed to him and I shall not forget his kindness and sympathy and the assistance he gave me.

It is said that the best portion of a good man's life is his little, nameless unremembered acts of kindness and love. How many such acts of kindness must have been recorded to Doctor LAZARO's credit during the score of years he practiced his profession as family physician in the beautiful, charming, and romantic land of Evangeline.

To his native parish he dedicated and consecrated the activities and ambitions of his young manhood. In addition to the practice of his profession, he was a successful planter. Deeply interested in the advancement of education, he served as president of the parish school board. With these many and varied interests and duties his life was filled.

In that charming section of Louisiana life is unique and distinctive. The planters—many of them—preserve the traditions and customs and habits which are their heritage. Nowhere else does life glide by more charmingly and pleasantly, and nowhere else is dispensed such warm and gracious hospitality. Doctor LAZARO and his cultured family were central figures in the charming social life of his community. His fellow citizens, recognizing and realizing that his outstanding ability warranted for him a broader field of action and a wider scope of service, sent him here to Washington as their Representative, where for many years he served them with such ability and fidelity as to be returned again and again. During his long term of service he accomplished much for his district and for his loved State.

His life's story rests sweetly in the memory of family and friends. Possibly his most striking characteristic was the gentleness and sweetness of his nature, which revealed itself to all through an ease and grace of manner most charming. The term gentleman in its broadest and fullest sense applied to him with perfect appropriateness. A splendid physique, nobility of countenance, and a charm of manner which seemed never to forsake him were among nature's precious gifts to him.

Doctor LAZARO was a scholar and a great lover of books.

He was a clear thinker. He possessed the ability to think through to the end. His judgment was sound on all important and fundamental subjects.

He was a devoted husband and father and an intensely loyal friend.

Here among his daily associates he was loved, admired, and esteemed. We miss him—and lament him; but with the old philosopher, we know—this of a truth—that no evil can happen to a good man even in life or after death.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, it is well that we in life should, in the midst of life's activities, pause to sacredly observe an occasion like this and to drop a flower and a tear in memory of our departed friends. In the exercise of this high but sad duty we not only confer some measure of honor upon him who has gone to "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns" to greet us again on this material earth, but we at the same time cultivate our own conception and understanding regarding the highest of things; that is, what we call life here and life hereafter. We, ourselves, profit in thus meditating upon the virtues and even the failings of the lives of those who have left us and in cherishing the sublime philosophy leading us to more highly useful lives on earth and to an abiding faith in the immortality of the soul.

It is peculiarly fitting, then, that we gather here to-day to memorialize the life and character of one of our most worthy colleagues, the Hon. LADISLAS LAZARO, the late Representative from the seventh district of the State of Louisiana, who served as a Member of this House with honor and distinction from the date of his election to the Sixty-third Congress to the time of his death, which occurred in Washington, D. C., March 30, 1927.

Doctor LAZARO was born June 5, 1872, near Ville Platte, Evangeline Parish, La. He was educated in the public and private schools of St. Landry Parish and Holy Cross College, New Orleans, and was graduated with the degree of doctor of medicine in 1894, and was a successful practicing physician from that date until 1913. He was a member and president of the parish school board in the community in which he lived and was also interested in farming. He was elected to the Louisiana State Senate in 1908 and in 1912 without opposition, and was elected to the Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, Sixty-fifth, Sixty-sixth, Sixty-seventh, Sixty-eighth, Sixty-ninth, and Seventieth Congresses.

His course and record as a Member of the House of Representatives and as an active member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and his other interests, particularly in agricultural affairs, were such as to win for him the approval and friendship of his fellow Members and of his constituents, whom he always faithfully and industriously served.

Considering him in more intimate and personal relations, it was my good fortune, as a fellow physician, to have known him well for many years. He was always a loyal friend, always sympathetic, and particularly genial, quiet, and modest. His was a useful and hopeful life, shedding its luster of generous, cheerful helpfulness upon all with whom he came in contact. He was free from affectation, a humanitarian, a patriotic, patient legislator and a good citizen, and possessed noble qualities as a family man, a faithful and devoted husband and father.

During the last days of the Sixty-ninth Congress, in one of our more intimate conversations, he told me the details of his physical condition which required him to undergo a surgical operation, which he was at that time planning to have performed immediately after the close of the Sixty-ninth Congress. He, as a trained and skillful physician, did not look forward to this operation as being serious or fatal, but unfortunately it proved to be in his case one of those rare instances where a comparatively trivial operation, in its complications, could and did prove fatal.

He was a lovable and attractive man and deserves to live in the confidence and esteem of those who confided in him, when he went away from the sight of all men to live elsewhere forever. It was to our advantage to have known him. Those of us who have lived to speak of him, bear witness to his useful and beautiful life, which is worthy of imitation by the best of us.

There is no death; the stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr Speaker and my colleagues, I held Doctor LAZARO in the highest esteem and had for him the deepest affection. When I entered on my duties as a Member of the Sixty-seventh Congress the colleagues from my State were universally kind and considerate to me, none more so than Doctor LAZARO. There was nothing mean about Doctor LAZARO. During my entire association with him I know of no act of his that could have come from an envious or narrow soul.

When the news came to me of his death I was shocked as I had never been before except on the news of the death of one of my own family. If I were called to say who was the most popular Member of Congress I would not hesitate to say that Doctor LAZARO was the most popular; he is one man I never heard any one criticize or speak ill of. He had a wonderful disposition. He was in truth and in fact a charitable man and one of the most tolerant men I ever knew. He might not agree with his colleagues or friends, but he accorded to them the same right that he asked for himself.

I will never forget on reaching the town of Opelousas, La., where there were literally thousands gathered from all of that section and all over the State of Louisiana to meet the train that bore his remains. The tributes were indeed beautiful. In the little town of Ville Platte, where his remains are now resting, I never saw such expressions of love and devotion paid to any man.

These meetings are usually formal; they are held by reason of a custom that has prevailed in this Capitol for years, but I feel sure that on like occasions there was no meeting ever held where one's colleagues had a more high regard or a deeper affection for the one in whose memory these proceedings are held.

I am glad I knew Doctor LAZARO. My association with him has made my life more pleasant. I can not speak of him and his early life before I came to Congress, but others that knew the circumstances surrounding it can better express them than I. I can only say that at some time, somewhere, I hope to meet him again.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, having had the privilege of serving for seven years upon a busy and important committee of the House with Doctor LAZARO, I presume that I was as intimately associated and acquainted with him as any of his colleagues, save the older Members of his own State delegation. Doctor LAZARO was a member of that committee when I was placed on the committee. I soon learned to respect him and his knowledge and opinion, and as our association developed I soon learned to most highly esteem him and have a most profound regard for his judgment and to love him as a man. There was no more faithful member of that committee than Doctor LAZARO. He rarely if ever failed to attend a session of the committee. He gave close study to every problem presented for consideration. He was a student of legislative matters, as he doubtless had been of his profession when he was practicing medicine. Doctor LAZARO was a man of definite opinions and convictions, and yet, as has already been suggested, he was always tolerant of the opinions of others. Always broad-minded, he devoted his great talents to a broad-visioned consideration of every subject. Because of his retiring disposition, quiet dignity, and extreme modesty, perhaps those who had not the privilege of a close association with him did not fully appreciate his sterling qualities. Doctor LAZARO was not a man of many words, but whenever occasion required he did not hesitate to kindly but firmly express his opinion, and it always carried weight with his colleagues; I am sure that all the Members entertained the same opinion of him and had the same high regard for his judgment that I did.

Doctor LAZARO was a perfect gentleman in every sense of the words. I never heard any of his colleagues nor anyone else criticize anything that he did or said. Always unruffled, always well poised, he never lost his temper, and he never failed to keep himself in such a state of mind that he could apply his talents to a broad, tolerant, wise consideration of anything in hand.

We were all shocked and grieved at the untimely and unexpected death of Doctor LAZARO. As suggested by our colleague Doctor KINDRED it was one of those things difficult to understand, and it was a shock to all of his friends and colleagues as well as to his own charming family.

I had the privilege of being a member of the congressional committee to accompany his remains and the immediate members of his family to his home in Louisiana. We left the train at Opelousas and rode 22 miles through the country and through his romantic district to Ville Platte, where we found several thousand of his devoted constituents and friends from all sections of the State waiting to pay their last homage to his memory. It was a matter of comment among members of our committee that the grief among the people was unmistakably manifested everywhere. When we left the train at Opelousas there were hundreds and hundreds of his friends there, and a large concourse went from there to Ville Platte, and all along the highway we were impressed by the repeated manifestations of grief and of devotion. We passed a number of schools, and the faculty and children of these schools, both white and black, were lined on the side of the highways and with bared heads and saddened countenances witnessed the passage of his remains and his family and friends. I have never attended any funeral at which there were more friends present or at which there was a greater evidence of genuine grief and of homage.

Reference has been made to Doctor LAZARO as a physician. Knowing his disposition and his attributes as I did, I am sure that he must have been an ideal physician. Ever kind, gentle, sympathetic, conscientious, faithful, studious, able—to my mind he possessed every attribute of a successful physician, and I am sure that his unselfish ministrations among his people as well as his later able, efficient, and patriotic service in their behalf in the National Congress accounted for the devotion that was manifested without exception.

Nothing that we can say, perhaps nothing except the tender touches of time, can soften or assuage the grief and the feeling of great loss upon the part of the members of his own household. However, I am sure it must be a great consolation to them to be able to cherish during the remainder of the days of their lives the memory of such a splendid citizen, such a patriotic public servant, such a devoted and considerate father and husband.

Mr. SPEARING. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, this is Mother's Day. All over the land children and other members of the family and friends are paying tribute to that greatest of all creations, the living mother. It is not only not inconsistent, but it seems to me entirely appropriate that we should gather to-day, the children, the family, the friends of our Doctor LAZARO and pay tribute to a father and a husband that has gone beyond our midst, and testify to the world that though we may not see him again in life, yet he nevertheless is with us and that we remember him, his sphere in life, and his good works.

Stricken as he was in the full vigor of manhood, still a young man as men go to-day, not thinking of death in the immediate future, not stricken with disease that meant certain death, but merely having an ailment that, as our good friend, the doctor from New York [Mr. KINDRED] has said, and as Doctor LAZARO knew, could be cured by a simple operation; not expecting death, but putting on to himself and so arranging that he could see more of life and be of greater usefulness, he was stricken, as I say, in the full vigor of manhood and his sphere of usefulness was gone.

Not long ago I read an account of a man in New York, I think, although the place is immaterial, who had left his office on business and in crossing the street was stricken down by an automobile and killed. When those who were left went to his office they found on his desk an unfinished poem, one verse of which seemed to fit that man's life and thought, and which it seems to me fits our friend, Doctor LAZARO. The verse that is so appropriate reads this way:

Let me die working,
Still tackling plans unfinished, tasks undone!
Clean to its end, swift may my race be run,
No laggard steps, no faltering, no shirking;
Let me die, working!

I do not know of anything that is more appropriate to our dear friend. Although not a physician, I had conversed with Doctor LAZARO about his ailment, and he told me of his anticipated operation, a simple thing to make him stronger, to make him better and more fitted for the duties he had here. He would not go during the session of Congress because he was working and there was in his nature no shirking, but when Congress adjourned and all things seemed serene, he took advantage of the opportunity that he might have this simple operation so that when Congress reassembled the following December he would be more fitted for the work which he had mapped out for himself.

It is not given to us to question the ways of Divine Providence. It is not irreverent, however, and I say it truthfully, there is not an irreverent bone or drop of blood in my body, therefore I feel justified in saying it is not irreverent to say we do not understand why our dear friend was taken from us. We do not, because we know not the ways of Providence.

It is said that death loves a shining mark. If this be true, then in this instance death—oh, that grim reaper—was true to its reputation. I do not mean to say that Doctor LAZARO was a scintillating light that passed on the firmament before our eyes and dazzled us with his brilliance. That was not his mission on earth, but I do say that he was as true as is the north star, and when it is said that death loves a shining light, it does not mean the brilliance of it, but it means his position, his standing among his fellow men, and our dear friend had this standing. We who are here know it.

I was one of those who had the privilege of knowing Doctor LAZARO even before he came to Congress. I knew him in other spheres of life, and, of course, long before I came here, because my tenure has been very, very short.

There are few men like Doctor LAZARO. He seemed to have a place in life that others do not hold—a lovable man. Oh, he was a lovable man; true in every respect; his family, his friends, even his acquaintances loved him. He attracted human beings, and probably dumb animals, just because of those attributes that stamp a man great among his fellow beings.

Not long ago I came across two verses describing two different sets or classes or characters of men. The first verse has no application to Doctor LAZARO—does not fit him at all—but I read it merely to emphasize the second verse, its meaning, its significance, its application to our friend in whose memory we are gathered here to-day.

The first verse runs:

I did a favor yesterday,
A kindly little deed,
And then I called to all the world
To stop and look and heed.
They stopped and looked and flattered me
In words I could not trust,
And when the world had gone away
My good deed turned to dust.

I say that does not fit Doctor LAZARO; he was just the antithesis, the opposite of that. Nothing showy or ostentatious about him, but he went among his fellow men as a true friend, always doing good.

The second verse more nearly fits him; in fact, almost if not actually, written for him. It reads:

A very tiny courtesy
I found to do to-day;
'Twas quickly done, with none to see,
And then I ran away.
But some one must have witnessed it,
For—truly I declare—
As I sped back the stony path
Roses were blooming there.

That was Doctor LAZARO—always courteous, always friendly, always generous, always magnanimous—always doing something for somebody, not openly, not ostentatiously, but something for a human being, aye just for a living being, because he loved life, he enjoyed it, and he loved human beings.

We have heard from those more intimately connected with his immediate life—how popular he was in his district.

If you will pardon me for what might seem a personal reference, my duties other than congressional took me during the past five or seven years into the section of Louisiana where Doctor LAZARO resided. That was before I even dreamed of the remote possibility of sitting in these halls. Coming in contact with these men and knowing that I had more or less interest in public affairs, they would talk with me about general conditions. Never have I heard one man say anything to the discredit of Doctor LAZARO. They might criticize others adversely, but never did any of them criticize Doctor LAZARO or reflect upon him.

You have heard from previous speakers how time after time he was elected to local offices and to Congress without opposition. Why? Because so often, all the time, ever and always, a very tiny courtesy he found to do to-day, and when he returned that stony path was covered with flowers blooming there.

Doctor LAZARO was not elected to Congress because of his affiliation with any political party or any faction of a political party, but because the people with whom he came in contact knew him, admired him, and loved him. I am glad that they could do him honor in any position that he wanted. Oh, my friends, I do not know, none of us know, if those whose spirits and souls have gone know what takes place on earth after the body that we have is nothing more than a lump of clay, but if those whose souls and spirits have departed know anything of what takes place on earth thereafter I can visualize the happiness and joy of Doctor LAZARO when he realized how his friends after he had ceased to be able to be of benefit, help and assistance to them, turned out to pay their respects to him.

My good friend Judge DAVIS has referred to Doctor LAZARO's funeral. It has been given me to attend obsequies on many occasions. I can say without fear of successful contradiction that never have I attended one like that of Doctor LAZARO. The whole countryside—from every quarter, from every section came people, not curiosity seekers as so often happens, but people bowed down in grief because their friend had gone and they knew him no more, could not converse with him, could not be of help and assistance to him, could not receive his ministration. Never have I seen anything like it—mile after mile on public roads, vehicles of all kinds carrying people bowed down with grief, not one of them in the spirit of curiosity, but genuine sorrow and regret that the man they looked up to, the man that they loved and respected, had gone and that they would have no more to do for him. Oh, it was a great tribute, and if he did know what was going on that was one of the happiest moments that he will spend in all eternity, because the true spirit was there through all of it. Anyone who was present could not deny it, and it was not disguised, because they knew the man; he had been among them. Oh, what a tribute it was that was paid by those people in and around the seventh district, although it was not confined to that district, because people from other districts who knew him came and paid testimony to a great man, a man who, as I said before, was true as the north star—not some fleeting comet that passes the vision and is gone, but is there for all time. Why? Because, in the words of this humble rhyme, a very tiny courtesy he found to do one day and 'twas quickly done with none to see, and then he ran away.

He was not showy, but some one must have witnessed what he did. He did not care, he did not know. Perhaps his Heavenly Father witnessed it and rewarded him. As he sped back to his old home where he had been born and raised, where his friends lived, where those who loved him remained, as he sped back to that resting place, the roses were blooming, and they were put there by his loving friends. His body will turn to dust, but his soul is not dead. His memory is with his friends whom he loved, and who loved and honored and revered him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, one of the pleasurable experiences which comes to a Member of Congress is that of friendships formed among those with whom he serves.

Whatever else may be said of the Congress of recent years there are those of us who know that among its members have been many choice spirits with whom it has been a pleasure to be associated and whom we are proud to call our friends.

Among these was Dr. LADISLAS LAZARO, of Louisiana, whose death we mourn and whose service we commemorate in these exercises to-day. While I can add nothing to the beautiful and justly deserved tributes which have already been spoken, my affectionate regard for him will not permit me to remain silent.

For four years, or through the Sixty-eighth and Sixty-ninth Congresses, we were colleagues; for 10 years prior thereto he had been an honored Member of this House. He had been elected to the Seventieth Congress and was entering upon his eighth term when the final summons came and removed him from our midst.

His long and continuous service is evidence of the high regard and esteem in which he was held by the people of the seventh congressional district of Louisiana. I witnessed further confirmation of the deep and sincere affection which his people had for him when we carried his remains from the Nation's Capital to his old home in Louisiana, and in the cemetery at Ville Platte, adjoining the grave of his father, and within a short distance of the place of his birth, he was laid to rest to sleep the last long sleep in the soil of the parish and State which he loved and which he had served so faithfully and well. Ville Platte is an inland town and the funeral party left the train at Opelousas, and the trip from there was made by automobiles.

I have never seen a larger or more grief-stricken crowd who met us at Opelousas and accompanied us to his last resting place. I quote from a report contained in a New Orleans paper:

> Mourning was general in this territory. The train bearing the body, members of Doctor LAZARO's family, and the congressional delegation was met at the Missouri Pacific station in Opelousas at 2 p. m. to-day by scores of personal friends, representatives of the Knights of Columbus and the Elks, to which orders he belonged, Company C, One hundred and fifty-eighth Infantry, Louisiana National Guard, commanded by Capt. Albert Tate, and thousands of other persons, including women and children. Escorted by the military company, the flower-banked coffin was conveyed in a hearse to Ville Platte, more than 300 automobiles following it.
> MOURNING WIDESPREAD
> All along the highway, farmers and their families, school children, both white and negro, stood with uncovered, bowed heads as the hearse passed. They were friends of Doctor LAZARO; many had been patients of his when he was a practicing physician. All business was suspended here. A great throng of people rallied here from all parts of the seventh district for the funeral, which was simple, with no singing or other music, according to one of his last requests.

The simplicity of the service was in keeping with the character of the man. Quiet and unassuming he went about his work with no ostentation or display—he cared not for the limelight or the glare of publicity. The consciousness of duty well performed was sufficient reward for him. To faithfully represent his people and to legislate for the Nation's welfare was his only ambition.

Before coming to Congress for nearly 20 years he practiced successfully his profession, that of a physician. He belonged to that noble band of men to whom we all owe a debt of gratitude—the country doctor. If I were an artist I would paint a picture of one of these self-sacrificing humanitarians driving an old-fashioned horse and buggy on a dark and stormy night going to alleviate the suffering of a patient in some remote and humble home. I am glad that the State of Georgia has recently placed in Statuary Hall the marble figure of Dr. Crawford W. Long, the discoverer of sulphuric ether as an anesthetic.

Doctor LAZARO had stamped upon his countenance the kindly and sympathetic character which his soul contained. He was the type of man who made many friends but no enemies. He loved humanity and he loved to serve it. At home he was the beloved physician. In Washington he was the honored statesman, but more than that he was the beloved colleague of every Member of Congress. We can never forget his kindly and contagious smile which brought sunshine into the home of the sick and which with his superb character won his way into the affections of his 434 colleagues.

Permit me to conclude this brief tribute by quoting the lines of a little poem by Jerome B. Bell, which seem to me so fittingly appropriate as describing his life:

> What is this mystery that men call death?
> My friend before me lies; in all save breath
> He seems the same as yesterday. His face
> So like to life, so calm, bears not a trace
> Of that great change which all of us so dread.
> I gaze on him and say: He is not dead,
> But sleeps, and soon he will arise and take > Me by the hand. I know he will awake
> And smile on me as he did yesterday;
> And he will have some gentle word to say,
> Some kindly deed to do; for loving thought
> Was warp and woof of which his life was wrought.
> He is not dead. Such souls forever live
> In boundless measure of the love they give.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, we have assembled here to-day for the purpose of paying tribute to the life and character of the late LADISLAS LAZARO. He was one of us but is now no more. We shall never see him again, for he has sailed beyond the sunset and the path of all the western stars. He has gone to meet the great choice, classic spirits of all the ages. Consoled with that belief we can not, however, refrain from the sigh that comes with the thought that we shall never see him again on this earth. He was my friend. My tears mingled with those who loved him best when we heard that he had received the final summons "to follow knowledge like a sinking star far beyond the utmost bounds of human thought." He lived a great life. To him it was a wonderful adventure. As a result of his studies in the field of medicine he philosophically looked to the termination of his earthly career. He was ever mindful of the fact that all things are born, live, die, pass away, and are ultimately forgotten. But with a vision that was the result of a steadfast and unalterable belief in the immortality of the soul he looked out beyond the Pleiades and far beyond the sun to that happy scene of another life on a higher, grander, nobler, and more wonderful stage where we shall all meet by the great white throne of God and sing the praises of Him on high for evermore. He brings to those in the land that is fairer and more beautiful than this, the rich and wonderful experience that he gathered while sojourning on this sphere. "I am a part of all that I have met" is a thought that he loved to dwell upon. Life indeed was a great romance to this advocate of liberal thought and individual freedom. As great as his knowledge of life was in its most beautiful aspect, he always felt that all experience is an arch through which gleams that untraveled world whose margin fades forever and forever as we move. He was a bold thinker and possessed to a remarkable degree the courage of his convictions. He met unflinchingly every great issue that presented itself to him as a national legislator and fearlessly expressed his views in behalf of individual liberty. He was one of nature's great noblemen. He did noble things and, in the immortal language of Kingsley, made life, death, and that vast forever one grand, sweet song.

To labor with zest, and give of your best,
For the joy and sweetness of the giving,
To help folks along with hand and with song—

was to him not only the real sunshine of living but the very highest religious thought which humanity could grasp. He loved his country as a whole, but his affections were more particularly centered upon Louisiana. He loved the alluringly beautiful name of that famous old State. He thrilled when anyone spoke of its magnificent sugar plantations, rice and cotton fields, its bayous and bays, its creeks and its rivers, its prairies and hilltops, its swamps and its fertile fields, its villages, towns, hamlets, and that great city of New Orleans. He loved the literature which it inspired, and was always deeply moved when anyone would quote from the many gems of thought that had been imperishably translated into the English tongue by the great men and women who were born and reared in that great Commonwealth. He loved to mention the wonderful effects of the sunrise upon the birds of the air and the beasts of the fields when they responded to the coloring of the skies by its golden chariot. He loved to dwell upon the wonders of a Louisiana sunset and often told me that he throbbed with an indescribable joy as he saw the marvelous tints and colorings of the western skies reflected by the trembling wavelets of the lagoons and bayous whose waters drift slowly to the Gulf of Mexico beneath the moss-covered oaks that sadly but majestically stand as sentinels of the wondrous scenes. The artist was deeply embedded in his nature, and he was profoundly moved by the lines of Longfellow describing the homes of the transported Arcadians, whose children are swept into an ecstasy of romance and tears by any recital of the wanderings of Evangeline and her Gabriel. For he was to the manor born—he was blood of their blood and bone of their bone, and he rests to-day with the great of yesterday in the hearts of that section which the great poet said is the Eden of Louisiana. A statesman with the soul of an artist, a physician with the vision of a poet, he felt and understood the profound pathos and the consoling hope of Thanatopsis—that sublime vision of death that has immortalized the great seer who wrote it into the literature of his native land. To him that great expression of an exalted spirit was a message of eternal peace among Elysian fields, a rainbow to the storms of life, the evening beams that smiled the clouds away.

To him who in the love of nature holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language; for his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and a smile
And eloquence of beauty, and she glides
Into his darker musings, with a mild
And healing sympathy, that steals away
Their sharpness, ere he is aware. When thoughts
Of the last bitter hour come like a blight
Over thy spirit, and sad images
Of the stern agony, and shroud, and pall,
And breathless darkness, and the narrow house,
Make thee to shudder, and grow sick at heart,
Go forth, under the open sky, and list
To nature's teachings, while from all around—
Earth and her waters, and the depths of air—
Comes a still voice.

Yet a few days, and thee
The all-beholding sun shall see no more
In all his course; nor yet in the cold ground,
Where thy pale form was laid, with many tears,
Nor in the embrace of ocean, shall exist
Thy image. Earth, that nourished thee, shall claim
Thy growth, to be resolved to earth again,
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix forever with the elements,
To be a brother to the insensible rock
And to the sluggish clod, which the rude swain
Turns with his share, and treads upon. The oak
Shall send his roots abroad, and pierce thy mold.

Yet not to thine eternal resting-place
Shalt thou retire alone, nor couldst thou wish
Couch more magnificent. Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings,
The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good,
Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past,
All in one mighty sepulcher. The hills
Rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun—the vales
Stretching in pensive quietness between;
The venerable woods—rivers that move
In majesty, and the complaining brooks
That make the meadows green; and, poured round all,
Old ocean's gray and melancholy waste—
Are but the solemn decorations all
Of the great tomb of man. The golden sun,
The planets, all the infinite host of heaven,
Are shining on the sad abodes of death,
Through the still lapse of ages. All that tread
The globe are but a handful to the tribes
That slumber in its bosom.—Take the wings
Of morning, pierce the Barcan wilderness,
Or lose thyself in the continuous woods
Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound,
Save his own dashings—yet the dead are there:
And millions in those solitudes, since first
The flight of years began, have laid them down
In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone.
So shalt thou rest, and what if thou withdraw
In silence from the living, and no friend
Take note of thy departure? All that breathe
Will share thy destiny. The gay will laugh
When thou art gone, the solemn brood of care
Plod on, and each one as before will chase
His favorite phantom; yet all these shall leave
Their mirth and their employments, and shall come
And make their bed with thee. As the long train
Of ages glides away, the sons of men,
The youth in life's fresh spring, and he who goes
In the full strenth of years, matron and maid,
The speechless babe, and the gray-headed man—
Shall one by one be gathered to thy side,
By those who, in their turn, will follow them.

So live that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, which moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, Doctor LAZARO was a member of the Bjeladinovic family of Risan, on the Gulf of Cattaro. His father came to America from Ercegovina.

The following beautiful tribute was paid to him by the Hon. Gilbert L. Dupré:

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT TO DR. LADISLAS LAZARO

When a good man has answered the summons which no one may disregard it is always well to note his departure and to record the good work accomplished during his stay among us.

Doctor LAZARO was a good man. He was a devoted husband and father, a stanch friend, a good neighbor, a sympathetic practitioner of his profession. He is worthy of imitation by all the young men in this parish and State. He was born a poor boy; had hardships to overcome, which he successfully did. From a country doctor he went to the school board. Education of the masses was his slogan.

Elected to the State senate in 1908, he devoted his efforts to the betterment of conditions generally. Reelected in 1912, he began to attract attention, and when Mr. Pujo announced his intention to retire from Congress Doctor LAZARO's friends prevailed upon him to become a candidate to succeed him.

After a vigorous contest he was declared the nominee. In 1914 State Senator Aladin Vincent, of Calcasieu, opposed him. Doctor LAZARO defeated him easily. He also overcame former District Attorney Edwards, of the same parish, in 1918. Thereafter he had no opposition; nominated without opposition five times.

He made a splendid Congressman. His constituents admired him, respected him, esteemed him. When Congress was at recess during the summer months he visited every parish in this district—not only the parish seat but other towns as well.

Doctor LAZARO was a splendid example of what any poor boy may accomplish in this State, this Nation. By dint of study and hard work, he rose from the rank of an obscure country lad to that of Congressman in a district peopled with politicians of ability and standing. He not only went to Congress but he remained over 13 years. He had become a fixture in that body, and no thought of opposing him occurred.

Doctor LAZARO had a healthy body, a fine, evenly balanced mind with unbounded cheerfulness and geniality. He was always pleasant, always agreeable. I never heard him utter an unkind word against a human soul. He had convictions and the courage to express these, but this was done in a quiet, easy, unassuming manner.

I am on the wrong side of the book of time. About half my time I am scarcely alive, and a great part of the rest the slave and sport of morbid feeling, due to my disordered condition. I have everything but good health.

Doctor LAZARO had health; had happiness; looked forward to a long, a successful career. His daughters married; he was looking for the advancement of his only son. He intended him for Princeton. Secure in the esteem of his constituents, he was looking forward to many years of usefulness. But he is gone, gone to the undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns. He retreated with the aspects of a victor. His sun went down at noon, but let us hope it sank amid the prophetic splendors of an eternal dawn.

The invalid bereft of one sense, enveloped almost at every turn, is alive to pay tribute to his young friend who, in love with life and raptured with the world, has passed to silence and pathetic dust. Verily, the ways of Providence are past finding out.

Good-by, Doctor. When last I met you I looked forward to your continued health, happiness, and prosperity. To-day I am sorrowfully paying tribute to your usefulness when alive—with the hope that you have secured life everlasting beyond the grave, which you so richly deserve.

The following is an editorial from one of his home papers:

[From the New Era, of Eunice, La., April 7, 1927]

THE LOSS OF CONGRESSMAN LAZARO

In the death of the late Hon. Dr. L. LAZARO, Representative in the House from the seventh congressional district, which composes the southwesterly group of parishes in Louisiana, the territory involved, as well as the entire State and South, lost a most faithful servant, who was not known for flowery speech and oratory but for his loyalty and serfdom for the people whom he served.

For 14 years he labored for his group of parishes. A man of his own convictions, to whom party principles were cast aside when the good of the seventh congressional district was to be considered. A constant reader and student, he had provided himself with a knowledge which fitted him to the cause of his public. Never until a situation had been thoroughly analyzed did the late lamented Congressman decide; but once decided he fought an honest battle to enlighten those in the Chamber as to the true benefits of the proposed measure.

His kindly attitude in the Capitol had marked him as a man worthy of the friendship of many distinguished statesmen who were proud to acclaim him as a friend. To him many of his colleagues often went to seek advice, and to them he never turned a deaf ear. Not only was he known and acclaimed as a friend by the important men of our Nation but, likewise, was he attached to the most common laborer in the Capitol buildings.

In passing to the great beyond he left a memory which can never be erased from the halls of time. At his funeral an outpouring such as has never been seen in this section of the State assembled to pay their last tribute. The towns along the route which the train traveled with the body bowed in sorrow. And again dampened eyes in the town of his birthplace by the citizens announced that Louisiana had not only lost a distinguished solon but a friend and upright and honest man.

Though he is dead he can not be forgotten. Children and more aged persons will continue to speak of his noble deeds in the future. When the Seventieth Congress convenes his smile and warm handclasp will be missing, and kindly advice once given can not be secured as before. Time alone will prove that few will enter from this district who can claim the honor of serving their public for 14 years, a goodly portion of which was without opposition. This one achievement alone marks him as a man "of the people and by the people and for the people."

ADJOURNMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the resolution already adopted, and as a special mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House will now stand adjourned.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, May 14, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

SHOOTING OF JACOB D. HANSON

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the feeling of high indignation in my State over the shooting of Mr. Hanson, at Niagara Falls, leads me to ask permission to insert certain material in the RECORD. I want to keep before the Senate the dastardly outrage which was perpetrated upon this citizen last week. Here he was, a private citizen engaged in no unlawful pursuit, on the way to his home, held up and shot by the Coast Guard. It might have been a minister on the way to see a dying man or the family physician on his rounds. It was an outrageous thing.

I am glad to report to the Senate that the Committee on Commerce one day this week will give consideration to the matter and hear Admiral Billard, of the Coast Guard Service.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in connection with these remarks first a series of resolutions passed by the Columbus Society, of Niagara Falls. This is a group of 500 or 600 persons of foreign birth who have banded themselves together for the purpose of encouraging and promoting the naturalization of foreign-born citizens and to inspire respect for all the laws of the United States. They are very much disturbed because two Coast Guard officials of the United States, intrusted with the duty of enforcing law and order, have themselves set a bad example for those who are not yet citizens. Not alone have they violated the laws of the State of New York but all natural laws and the law of God, by shooting down in cold blood an esteemed and highly respected citizen of Niagara Falls.

Likewise, I have some resolutions passed by the Dunkirk Lodge, Loyal Order of Moose, Dunkirk, N. Y. I also hold in my hand an editorial from the New York Daily News relating to the Hanson case. I ask that all of the resolutions and the editorial may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks and be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions and editorial are as follows:

Special meeting of the Columbus Society, of Niagara Falls, called for the express purpose of adopting resolutions on the shooting of Jacob D. Hanson on Lewiston Hill, in Niagara County, on the morning of May 6, 1928

The following resolution was duly adopted:

"Whereas this society, consisting of 557 members, was formed with a purpose of encouraging and promoting the naturalization of all foreign-born candidates for membership, and for the further purpose of teaching and inspiring respect for all laws of the United States and of the State of New York and the Constitution of the United States; and

"Whereas it has come to our attention that the very persons, 'two Coast Guard men,' entrusted with the duty to enforce law and order, have themselves set a bad example for those who are not yet citizens of this country by not only violating the laws of this great State but all natural laws and the law of God, by shooting down in cold blood an esteemed and highly respected citizen of this community; that this atrocious crime was committed without the slightest pretense of a cause or suspicion by two reckless, irresponsible, disreputable characters; and

"Whereas we are of the opinion that these characters are not worthy of being called citizens of the same country of which we have the honor of swearing allegiance and loyalty to; and

"Whereas we believe that the legally constituted authorities do not sanction any such high-handed tactics, and that the authorities have greater respect for the rights of the public lawfully using the highways in the nighttime; and

"Whereas it is most humiliating and embarrassing to us to learn that such an important governmental official as the United States district attorney refuses to cooperate with the State authorities in bringing to justice these vicious men, and, in fact, as we are informed by the press, orders officers of the United States guard to refuse the State authorities the right to exercise their function in executing the mandate of the State court without even as much as an order of similar force; and

"Whereas we have been taught that the United States district attorney is the chief prosecuting officer of violators of the law, and therefore should not encourage the withholding of offenders from the process of the law; and

"Whereas this action tends to arouse doubt in our minds as to the sincerity of the great principle embodied in the Constitution of this great country, that all men shall be treated equally, and that the law shall be administered equally among all citizens of this country; and

"Whereas we are in doubt that this action on the part of the United States district attorney reflects the sentiment of proper governmental functioning as intended by the heads of this Government and understood by us; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we express our indignation at the unwarranted, cowardly shooting of a respectable and law-abiding citizen, lawfully traveling on the public highways of this community; that we resent such dangerous characters being permitted to roam at large under the guise of being United States enforcement officers and endangering the lives of persons lawfully using the public highways after dark; be it further

"Resolved, That we are highly indignant at the attitude of the United States district attorney, whose duty it is to prosecute criminals, in his refusal to order the delivery of these criminals to answer for the violation of a State law, and that we consider such an action an assault on the dignity and respect of the sovereignty of the State of New York; and it is further

"Resolved, That if this attitude on the part of one of the chief prosecuting officers of the State of New York pass unnoticed by the higher authorities, the very teaching and purpose of our society are defeated, and respect for law can not be expected from those who are less cognizant of the law and customs of this country;

"That the flagrant violation of the law of the State and of the mutual understanding between the State and Federal Government be brought to the attention of our honorable Senators and Congressmen, to the end that speedy action be taken in delivering these criminals to justice; and it is further

"Resolved, That there is more in the refusal of the Federal petty officers to deliver these men than the impeding and interfering with the speedy trial and punishment of the betrayers of the trust of law enforcement or the making of the highways safe for the innocent public, but that this attitude tends to breed contempt for law and order and sows the seed of discontent and inspires mob violence as the only means of administering justice; and be it further

"Resolved, That we call upon the United States district attorney to order the surrender of these criminals to the State authorities; and be it further

"Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this meeting and copies thereof be sent to Senators WAGNER and COPELAND, Congressmen DEMPSEY, MEAD, and MACGREGOR, to the United States district attorney for the western district of New York, and to the press."

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true, accurate, and correct transcript of the resolution passed by the Columbus Society at a special meeting held May 9, 1928.

[SEAL.] LAVINO NANULIE, Secretary.

Whereas Jacob H. Hanson was promiscuously assaulted and shot down in cold blood while peacefully traveling along a public highway in the vicinity of Niagara Falls, N. Y.; and

Whereas his wounds, if not fatal, will prove mortal to the mental, thinking, and seeing senses of this citizen of the United States; and

Whereas due to this he has been sacrificed on the altar of intolerance, prejudice, and un-American doctrines, which have changed the status of the Constitution of our great American Republic; and

Whereas said Jacob H. Hanson was always known to be the leader of charity on the great Niagara frontier; his raising of funds for the Sisters' Hospital for the care of the tubercular afflicted; his sunshine parties in behalf of the orphans; his filling of baskets of charity on Thanksgiving and Christmas; and because of the thousands of other public benefactions in which he was instrumental: Be it

Resolved, That the Loyal Order of Moose, Lodge 89, be placed on record as protesting and condemning the acts of the Federal Coast Guard, and as requesting the mayor and common council of the city of Dunkirk to offer their assistance to further the bringing to justice the Federal officials responsible for this outrageous and murderous attack by so-called Government officials; and be it further

Resolved, That we extend our sincere and fullest sympathy to the Benevolent Order of Elks, Lodge No. 346, of Niagara Falls, and to his family, relatives, and many friends for the loss they have sustained through the incapacity and perhaps full loss of Mr. Jacob H. Hanson; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be broadcast through the public press, and that copies be sent to the common council of the city of Dunkirk, to our Member of Congress, and our United States Senators, and to the convention of the Loyal Order of Moose at Chicago, to be held from June 4 to 7, 1928, with a request for some action on the matter.

FRED ASPER,
Vice Dictator (Presiding).
JOHN DILLENKOFER,
Dictator.

HANSON'S CASE

Pictured here is the latest sacrifice to the holy cause of Federal prohibition.

He is Jacob D. Hanson, of Niagara Falls, N. Y. Mr. Hanson is secretary of the Elks lodge in that community and a highly respected and law-abiding citizen.

At this writing Mr. Hanson has a fractured skull, no eyesight, and a bare chance to live. If he does live, physicians say he will be blind and mentally befogged for the rest of his life.

Hanson was shot in the head last week end by a couple of United States Coast Guard men assigned to prohibition duty. The thing happened early Sunday morning. These men, in plain clothes, accosted Hanson's car as he was returning from a lodge meeting. Evidently mistaking them for stickups, Hanson tried to drive by. The guard men shot. One bullet got Hanson in the head.

This is the kind of thing that can and does happen under Federal prohibition. We arm irresponsibles with enormous powers over all of us. Then we wonder why they occasionally shoot us up. Niagara County may be wondering why its own courts can not try these thugs for assault or murder, since the Federal Government will probably be able to jerk the case into the Federal courts if it tries.

Senator COPELAND has obtained promise of an investigation of the Hanson case by the Senate Commerce Committee. That is nice, but it will neither mend Hanson's skull nor pull the man-killing teeth out of the prohibition law.

EUROPEAN CORN BORER CONTROL

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, early in the session the House passed what is known as the corn borer control bill, the bill (H. R. 12632) to provide for the eradication or control of the European corn borer. Later the bill was passed by the Senate. After it had passed the Senate and had been messaged to the House, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. The end of the session is drawing near and I should like to have some action on that motion. I understand the rule to be that anyone can call up the motion to reconsider submitted by the Senator from Utah if he should insist on his motion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would have called it up several days ago except for the fact that simultaneously with the request that the bill be returned from the House there was a request for the return of another bill from the House.

Mr. McNARY. That was the pink boll weevil bill.

Mr. KING. Yes. It has not yet been returned and I have merely deferred action. I will say to the Senator that some time during the afternoon I shall not object to having the matter brought before the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. I understand that the House would not give unanimous consent for the return of the pink boll weevil bill to the Senate even upon motion, and that in the case of the corn-borer control bill, no objection was interposed. In the case of the pink boll weevil bill there was objection, hence the House would not return it. I only mention the matter at this time, since I think it of some importance that some disposition should be made of the bill at the present session so that work may be begun on the eradication of the borer.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to call it up during the day, if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the Senator calling it up some time later in the afternoon.

To the Congress of the United States:

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 14, 1928.

CIVILIAN ASSISTANTS, OFFICE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] a day or two ago had inserted in the RECORD a cablegram from Governor General Stimson, of the Philippines, in respect to a bill now pending before the Congress. I advised the Philippine Commissioner, Mr. GUEVARA, and he wrote me a letter concerning the statement contained in Governor General Stimson's cablegram. In view of the importance of the matter I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, the letter from Mr. GUEVARA.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 10, 1928.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In view of the verbal information you kindly gave me this noon regarding the cable sent by Gov. Henry L. Stimson, urging the passage of the Senate bill 2292, authorizing the Governor General of the Philippine Islands to spend $125,000 without the necessity of any further appropriation to pay the salaries and traveling expenses for his assistants and technical advisers, not to exceed seven in number, I wish to state the following:

I do not believe that at present there exist corruptions and other evils in the Philippine Government and its branches. Personally, and knowing as I do now the Filipino people, I do not believe that there is now nor in the past any corruption or evil in the government and its branches which should command special action by the Congress of the United States. If there is any corruption or misdeed committed by any Filipino official in the government of the Philippine Islands, the Governor General, who is the supreme chief executive of that government, can by law use the provincial prosecuting attorneys, the personnel of the attorney general's office, the court of first instance and justices of the peace, the Philippine constabulary, whose chief and assistant chiefs are Americans of high standing, the secret service and municipal police, and other governmental agencies under his immediate supervision and control, and so the departments of justice, commerce and communications, finance, interior, public instruction, agriculture with its several bureaus. The Governor General of the Philippine Islands, besides, has actually under his service assistants and technical advisers whose names are: General Dorey, who also served as assistant to the late Governor General Wood; Colonel Winship, who was appointed while serving as an aid to President Coolidge; Major Hitchen and Lieutenant Grant. Besides these assistants and technical advisers that Govennor Stimson took along with him to the islands, he is provided by the appropriation law of the Philippine Legislature with the following personnel, which is actually serving in his office:

Secretary to the Governor General, with a compensation of	₱11,000
Assistant secretary to the Governor General	6,000
One cable clerk	5,000
One assistant cable clerk	4,500

And 26 clerks and 5 messengers more.

The Governor General has also a complete clerical force in his accounting division, record division, and a complete custodial force in the Malacañang Palace.

His present assistants and technical advisers, General Dorey, Colonel Winship, Major Hitchen, and Lieutenant Grant, have no specific legal duties to perform. The task they are supposed to perform are those that the Governor General may direct one or all of them to investigate certain cases of maladministration or corruption that may occur from time to time in the provincial and municipal governments, and even in the central government. The Governor General can assign his present assistants and technical advisers and the other governmental agencies mentioned above to any duty he may see fit. His present secretary, Mr. Franks, is an American who has been in the Philippine Islands for the last 15 years.

It is important to note that the Filipino people, through their leaders, are at present heartily cooperating with Governor General Stimson, and the same is true of the American residents in the Philippine Islands. If the Governor General of the Philippines needs any extra official help to suppress the corruptions denounced in his cable, he can call to his help Filipinos and Americans, both in private and public life, and I am sure they will be more than glad to render him such help and assistance as he may need.

I have a high regard for Governor Stimson and sincerely believe that his appointment to the important position he holds now has inaugurated an era of mutual understanding and cooperation between the United States and the Filipino people. It is to be regretted, however, that instead of recommending to his legislature measures that he deems necessary for the efficiency of the government of the Philippine Islands, he is appealing to the Government of the United States, which undoubtedly the Filipino people will resent.

In passing, I shall call your attention to the fact that if it is true, as Governor Stimson reports in his cable above mentioned, that there now exist corruptions that can not be controlled by himself as Chief Executive, and other existing governmental agencies in the Philippine Government, it would be worth while to ask whether the seven assistants and technical advisers, provided for in the Senate bill 2292, will be able to accomplish what the whole government of the Philippine Islands, including its distinguished Chief Executive, are at present unable to attain.

If Governor Stimson is basing his report of uncontrollable corruptions existing in the Philippine Government upon the assumption that there is a conspiracy among Filipino officials in the government, for such purpose, much as I respect and hold in high regard the distinguished Governor General, I shall lay bare before the Senate of the United States my most energetic protest against such a conclusion.

In closing I wish to say that you may use this letter as you may deem it convenient; and hoping that you will continue your support and advocacy for a just and fair play on the part of the Government of the United States to the people of the Philippine Islands, I am,

Very respectfully yours,

PEDRO GUEVARA,
Resident Commissioner from the Philippines.

FRENCH BROAD RIVER BRIDGE ON NEWPORT-ASHEVILLE ROAD, TENNESSEE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4045) granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the French Broad River on the Newport-Asheville (N. C.) road near the town of Del Rio, in Cocke County, Tenn., which was, on page 1, line 5, after the article "a," to insert "free highway."

Mr. TYSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF LAND NEAR WINNEMUCCA, NEV.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2084) for the purchase of land in the vicinity of Winnemucca, Nev., for an Indian colony, and for other purposes, which were, on page 2, line 6, to strike out the word "such"; and on page 2, to strike out all after the word "cabins," in line 7, down to and including the word "necessary" in line 8.

Mr. ODDIE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenues, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment found on page 119, a similar amendment on page 123, two amendments on page 140, and two amendments on page 146, all of which have reference to the 12½ per cent tax upon corporations and all of which agree with the amendment which was adopted on Saturday, making the tax on corporations 12½ per cent instead of 11½ per cent, may be agreed to.

Mr. KING. They do not relate in any way to retroactive provisions?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. My request is merely to make the bill conform to the amendment adopted by the Senate on Saturday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments indicated by the Senator from Utah are agreed to.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, on Saturday, last, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] was in his usual mood of genial criticism of everybody. In the course of that debate he found occasion to cast some of his keen reflections upon the progressive element of the Republican Party, but he was more severe, perhaps, upon the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], than upon any other Senator. I notice the Senator from Mississippi then said:

> The Senator at that time was just as wrong in his figures and just as misleading in his estimates as he is to-day. To me, Mr. President, it is one of the surprises of the age that on this issue he can hoodwink and cement together on his side of the aisle Senators who have talked progressivism and Senators who have stood in their tracks for more than 40 years and are known as the stand-pat crowd.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa state from what he is reading?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of what date?

Mr. BROOKHART. Of date May 12 instant.

Mr. McNARY. Who made the speech from which the Senator from Iowa is reading?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am reading from the speech of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. May I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that if he will continue to read that speech he will make a very good speech?

Mr. BROOKHART. I should be doing so from the standpoint of the Senator from Mississippi, but there happens to be a different standpoint on the part of some of us. Again the Senator from Mississippi said:

> What is that amendment? Ah, you will be called on to vote on it. I am wondering if this coalition that has been formed between the Republicans and the so-called progressives—who always backslide at the wrong time—is going to endure.

Mr. President, I wish to direct my attention first to the question of who has done the "backsliding" on this tax proposition. In 1924 I was a Member of the Senate, and I had the pleasure of working for a tax bill with the Senator from Mississippi, and also with the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. In that tax bill certain basic elements were worked out and followed. At that time the Senator from Mississippi and other Senators were not for the so-called tax reduction. They were for paying the public debt. I remember on that bill with what enthusiasm the progressives on this side of the Chamber joined with the Democratic side in the enactment of the estate tax. The rates of that tax went up to 40 per cent, and the tax was enacted on the theory that it was not a war measure but a permanent measure of just taxation in the United States. It was the most important principle of taxation that had been enunciated in the Senate in many a day.

I am proud to say that the author of that law was a Representative from my own State, Mr. RAMSEYER, of the sixth district. The bill was further amended on motion of another Representative from my own State, Mr. Green, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. We laid down a principle of taxation that was far-reaching and which was just in every particular. We defeated the Mellon tax plan as to that great proposition, and the Senator from Mississippi helped us do it. Then two years rolled around, and who is it who has backslid or changed? Who is it who has changed front on this proposition of taxation? There is not one of the progressives to-day but will right now vote to put the estate-tax rate back up to 40 per cent, where it belongs.

In addition to the 40 per cent rate, there was only a 25 per cent rebate, I believe—I am speaking now entirely from memory—in that bill. However, two years later, after this backsliding had occurred, there was a rebate of 80 per cent to the States. That, of course, creates a kind of competition or rivalry and contest as it were between the State governments and the National Government. That was put in for a backsliding purpose, in order ultimately to defeat the estate tax itself. Who did that? It was not the progressives on this side of the Chamber; no; that move was led by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi and others on his side of the Chamber. What brought about this change of sentiment, this change of position?

The great estates of this country valued at $10,000,000 and more that were taxed up to 40 per cent have been accumulated by profits, largely excess profits, off the people of the whole country. Such estates form the most just subject of taxation we have, and the tax collected ought not to be rebated to the State, because in only a few States live the owners of most of these great estates, and when we rebate 80 per cent to the States, five or six States in the Union get that special benefit at the expense of all the other States. Yet the great backslider on this proposition was the Senator from Mississippi himself.

In whose interest is this backsliding? For whom is he speaking now? In 1924 he was speaking and voting in the interest of the common people of the United States. Who is to be benefited by this tax reduction he is now proposing? I glean the facts from his own speech, in which he says:

> Here is the United States Chamber of Commerce, just adjourned after its meeting in Washington, composed of hundreds of thousands of members comprising business men and leaders in business throughout the country. Every chamber of commerce and board of trade is a member of it. Only yesterday they passed a resolution, which I asked to be incorporated at the close of my remarks, asking for a reduction of the tax on corporations and criticizing and condemning the policy of the administration for levying these high taxes on the American people and drawing from them more than is necessary to run the Government economically.

The United States Chamber of Commerce seems to be the organization in whose interest this "backsliding" was done.

Again, the Senator said:

> I say to Senators on the other side of the Chamber that they do not fool and they have not fooled the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. President, I have not any desire to fool the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. I am ready to figure out most all the time what it wants and then go the other way as a safe general deduction; and when we passed the tax bill in 1924 we did not do it at the suggestion of the United States Chamber of Commerce; we were not following the lead, nor was the Senator from Mississippi following the lead, of that great profiteering crowd in 1924. Backsliders! Senators who make such a charge had better think of their own records before they accuse anybody of "backsliding." I know of no progressive on this side of the Chamber who has changed his position on a single principle relating to national taxation since 1924. It is the Senator from Mississippi himself who has changed and taken this other view.

Now, what about the corporation tax? I am for a graduated corporation tax.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Do I understand that the Senator is opposed to crediting on the Federal estate tax the amount of the inheritance or estate tax paid to the State?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; and I will tell the Senator why.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not sure, but I think the Senator from Mississippi opposed the continuance of the Federal estate tax and contended that that field of taxation should be left to the States. I think he was also opposed to the credit of 25 per cent in the act of 1924 and the credit of 80 per cent in the act of 1926, and now to be continued, according to the action of the other House. I think the Senator from Mississippi was opposed to both those propositions. I am glad to hear the Senator from Iowa is opposed to the credit arrangement, which is an effort, pure and simple, to coerce the States, and I should like to see him opposed to the Federal estate tax entirely, because I think that field should be left to the States.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I will be glad to explain briefly my position upon both of those propositions.

I do not believe in a double estate tax. I should like to see it arranged so that the estates accumulated in intrastate commerce should be taxed only by the States and the estates accumulated in interstate and foreign commerce should be taxed only by the Federal Government. I think that is the logical division of this estate-tax proposition. A proposition of that kind is probably very difficult if not impossible of administration, however, because it would be impossible to untangle them. I should, therefore, instead like to see the States limited to estates of different amounts, so that small estates of $100,000, $200,000, or $300,000—whatever will be a reasonable division—will be left to the States to be taxed and the large estates will be taxed by the National Government.

I am entirely opposed to any rebate whatsoever, and I will illustrate that.

Let us take Henry Ford's estate; and I take that only because everybody knows so well something of Henry Ford's great business. Let us suppose that estate were to be taxed now, and we will suppose it is $2,000,000,000. I have no doubt it is more than $2,000,000,000. Under the present rate of 20 per cent that estate would then pay $400,000,000 in taxes, and under the rule of rebates $320,000,000 of that, or 80 per cent of it, would go back to the State of Michigan, although perhaps that vast sum was created as much by the State of Florida as it was by the State of Michigan; and it is unjust that any portion of that should be turned back to Michigan in any different way or any different degree than to the State of Florida. Therefore that money should remain in the National Treasury, and it should go to pay for building our roads.

I am in favor of the Government building roads without State aid. I have supported in this session a $50,000,000 road bill presented by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I have voted to report out that bill. That is a Federal aid bill. I have supported a bill providing for another Federal road from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast, introduced by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] that is to be built entirely by the Federal Government itself. These estate taxes, with the tax properly levied, are the best basis for dealing with that situation.

I think that answers the Senator's question so far, at least, as my position is concerned.

Now, I want to say a word about the corporation tax.

I am for a graduated corporation tax, but it ought to be graduated on the right basis. The right basis is the rate of income on the fair and honest capital investment. For instance, if a corporation has a 4 per cent earning upon its capital investment—and I mean by that an honest capital—it ought to have a low rate, perhaps 2 or 3 per cent. We ought to start at a low graduation. If it has an earning of 4¼ per cent that rate ought to be increased perhaps 1 per cent or more, and the graduations ought to be made on that basis; and after we reach the grades of excess profits they should be graduated up still higher.

What is an excess profit in the United States? I should like to define that again. I have had occasion to do it a few times. I say to you that the American people are only producing 5½ per cent, with all their capital, all their labor, all increase in property value, and all depreciation of the dollar added together. If, then, the average earning of all the country is but 5½ per cent, you are reaching an excess profit when you pass 5½ per cent; and then the rates should be increased.

Again, we have a difficulty of administration in that matter, because to go out and survey the value of all these corporations is almost an interminable job. Look at the difficulty we have had in determining the value of the railroads. I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] raised a great and a vital question to the future of our country when he said we had created corporations in this country that had run away with the very powers of our Government. That is true. I have contemplated preparing a bill that would call for a regulation of these corporations; and I think the time will come when we must take all these corporations in interstate commerce into Government charter, and the value of their capital must be put upon a gold-dollar basis—a cash basis. It must not be an inflated value. As soon as we have made that regulation and have established that basis for corporate capital, then we can tax them with a proper, graduated corporation tax; and I am ready for that at any minute.

Mr. President, I should like now to ask the chairman of the committee in reference to who pays the taxes to the Government of the United States. I want to see if anybody else outside of the members of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States is going to be benefited by this fake, camouflaged tax reduction that the Senator from Mississippi is advocating.

In the report on this bill I find that we collect from customs $585,000,000 and $2,000,000 of tonnage tax. Then comes current income tax, $1,890,000,000. Does that include the corporation tax, I will ask the chairman of the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. My attention was distracted. I did not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. BROOKHART. In the report of the committee on page 2, in setting out the amount of taxes authorized for 1929, according to the estimate—this is only an estimate, but it is not far different from the old law—the current income tax is given as $1,890,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That includes the corporation tax.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is corporation tax and individual income tax both. In that you reduce the little corporations by raising their exemption from $2,000 to $3,000?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then I want to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that I put in the RECORD some time ago figures of Mr. Hoover showing that since 1922 177,000 corporations in the United States have operated at a loss and have had no tax whatever to pay and are exempt from tax on that account, so that the little corporations of the country are not paying this great tax. It is the big corporations that are paying it. In fact, it is the big fellows that are paying most of the Government tax, except the indirect prices that are put upon the people, perhaps, by the customs duties.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. How is this so-called tax reduction going to help the farmer and the laboring man, then?

Mr. BROOKHART. That is what I was coming to. The Senator from Minnesota very properly asks how the Senator from Mississippi, with all his talk of tax reduction, is going to reduce taxes on the farmers of the United States or on the laboring people of the United States. I quoted, I think before the Senator from Minnesota came in, the statement of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that he is reducing taxes for the members of the United States Chamber of Commerce They are his clients in this great patriotic system of tax reduction in this campaign year.

I notice here an item of "Miscellaneous, $630,000,000." Will the Senator from Utah explain who pays those items, mainly?

Mr. SMOOT. That includes all payments which we receive from railroads and other sources, such as small taxes that will be collected.

Mr. BROOKHART. None of that is collected from the farmers of the United States?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes, Mr. President. Every time a farmer smokes a cigarette, he pays part of it.

Mr. BROOKHART. He pays that indirect tax?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Tobacco taxes are the most of it.

Mr. BROOKHART. He smokes his cigarette and pays his tax, and then when the cigarette king of the United States and the world dies we rebate 80 per cent of his taxes back to the State in which he lived.

Mr. President, I think this tax-reduction talk is political talk. I think its appeal is to the profiteer and to the campaign contributor. I think he is the fellow that gets the benefit. If any benefit is going to come from the other side of the Chamber for this illogical and unreasonable talk of tax reduction, it will be an increase in campaign contributions; and I think you will be worse fooled by the United States Chamber of Commerce than the Senator from Utah has ever fooled us progressives.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. If I understand the Senator's position, it is that he does not believe in tax-reduction legislation at this time.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator would apply the surplus to the national debt?

Mr. BROOKHART. I would.

Mr. HARRISON. While I am on my feet, let me ask the Senator whether he is in favor of the committee amendment or the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] with reference to the reduction of surtaxes?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am not sufficiently familiar with the bill to understand just what items the Senator refers to.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the pending question. I thought perhaps the Senator did not understand it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am not for reducing any of those taxes. I would increase them, as I said, and I would increase the estate tax away up.

Mr. HARRISON. But when the Senator is called on to vote on the pending question, and will have to support either the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina or the Committee amendment, does the Senator know now how he is going to vote?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think I do.

Mr. HARRISON. How is the Senator going to vote?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am going to vote for the committee position.

Mr. HARRISON. I see.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think, then, I shall vote against the whole bill. I certainly shall unless there are some provisions dealing with questions of administration that it is desirable to pass. I do not believe in tax reduction at all at this time. I know it is not for the benefit of the people of the country to reduce these taxes. Now is the time to pay this debt, while we have the money, and while the profiteers who made the money out of the war are still at hand to be taxed for that purpose.

Again, Mr. President, I desire to inquire, Is there any provision in this bill for the $400,000,000 that has been provided in the farm bill that has passed both Houses of Congress? Is that included in this estimate?

Mr. SMOOT. That would come in an appropriation bill, not in this bill. If that bill becomes a law, whatever expense may come from the enactment of that law will have to be taken care of in the urgency deficiency appropriation bill which the House, I think, began considering Saturday.

Mr. BROOKHART. But has it been included in these tax estimates?

Mr. SMOOT. It has not.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then, if that bill should become a law, it will create a deficit; will it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It all depends upon how much money would have to be appropriated for the first year. If the full amount of appropriation were made, of course then there would be a deficit right off. There is no question about that.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator will concede that if we handle the exportable surplus of agriculture the first year, it would take it all and more, too; would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; if they handle all of the products that are provided for in that bill, the $400,000,000 will not be sufficient.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, is the Senator talking about the farm bill?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me, with regard to the farm bill, I think if the Senate will investigate the amount of farm products imported into this country, unless some tariff schedules are written into the law to stop some of these imports and make that bill effective, the chances are that the whole world will ship agricultural products in here, and we will have to buy the products of all the world.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator knows my position on the question of the tariff rates upon agricultural products. As far as I am personally concerned, I will support any kind of a tariff rate suggested by the organizations, as we did in the passage of the act of 1922.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that proposition is beside the one we are now discussing.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, it is entirely aside from it.

Mr. BROOKHART. It is all right; but I want to confine my discussion at this time to the question of what is provided for in this bill, and the necessity for tax reduction.

No estimate is made, and no sum is included for the farm bill. Therefore the farmers are to have no relief from the Treasury of the United States. On the other side of the Chamber, after all this talk about farm relief, after the Senator from Mississippi voted for the farm bill, then he brings in a bill with less provision for taxes than even the committee on this side of the Chamber, with less provision to take care of the farmers than would the bill now pending.

Mr. President, I desire again to ask the chairman of the committee if there is included in the estimates in connection with this bill anything for flood control.

Mr. SMOOT. Not any estimate that has been sent from the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. BROOKHART. These estimates, then, are all made without allowing anything for expenditure on flood control?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is true.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator have an idea how much would be expended under the flood control bill the first year?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the general understanding is, not to exceed $30,000,000.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then these propositions for tax reduction are altogether without reference to the interest of the people of the United States. They are in the interest of the chamber of commerce and of politics, a play on politics.

Mr. President, there is one other situation in regard to taxation which I think ought to be considered now, and one other reason why I am not for tax reduction. That is in reference to the soldiers of the United States—I mean the common soldiers. I introduced a pension bill at this session. It is a general bill, graduating all of the soldiers of the Spanish-American War into the pension rates and grades of the soldiers of the Civil War, putting the soldiers of the World War under the same law under which the Spanish-American soldiers are now.

When I introduced that bill, in a general way, I thought probably it would cost three or four hundred million dollars, maybe more, but the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], asked the Secretary of the Interior for a report upon the provisions of the bill, and in his report he showed that raising the 150,000 survivors and 250 nurses of the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition now on the rolls to the varying rates indicated, increasing them to the rates now paid to the Civil War pensioners, would cost approximately $63,350,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator's bill propose a pension for all Spanish-American veterans and World War veterans, based upon their reaching a certain age, without regard to physical disability?

Mr. BROOKHART. I did not change the provisions of the law as it now applies to the soldiers of the Spanish War. I simply placed the World War veterans under the same law and with the same rates.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Civil War veterans now receive a pension without regard to their physical condition. I was wondering whether the bill of the Senator proposed a pension to the Spanish War veterans and World War veterans upon reaching a given age, without regard to their incapacity.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the form in which the bill is drawn, the same as applies to Spanish war veterans; but I would have no objection to an amendment that would reach the proposition which the Senator suggests.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The law that pensioned all Civil War veterans was not passed for a good many years after the Civil War, and was originally with age limitations.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; it was too long afterwards. All pension bills have been delayed too long. We have turned loose hundreds and thousands of war profiteers in these wars, to make millions out of the blood money of the war and then have delayed an economic reward for the soldiers themselves until most of them were dead and gone.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if I remember correctly, the last bill affecting the Spanish war veterans took into consideration age as a disability, the same as with regard to soldiers of the Civil War.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The bill of the Senator from Iowa is much more liberal than the last bill enacted.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not read the bill, so I can not say; but in answer to the question as to the Spanish War veterans, the attaining of a certain age would have the same result as with regard to Civil War veterans.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand Civil War veterans are pensioned regardless of age, and that there is no legislation of this nature regarding World War veterans.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator from Massachusetts remember the age limit fixed in the law for Spanish War veterans?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have the impression that Spanish War veterans receive varied amounts according to their ages and regardless of physical condition. Those who are 62 years of age receive $20; those who are 68 years of age receive $30; those who are 72 years of age receive $40; and those 75 years of age $50.

Mr. BROOKHART. Before they draw a pension?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. They all draw pensions at 62 years, even without any disability?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They draw pensions for disability at any time.

Mr. BROOKHART. At any age?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. My bill would make the same provision for the soldiers of the World War, if it should be enacted. There are just the two propositions: First, to put the Spanish War soldiers on the basis of the Civil War soldiers at this time, and, secondly, to put the World War soldiers on the basis of the Spanish War soldiers. That being done, the first proposition would cost only $63,350,000 and the second proposition would cost only $73,800,000. Yet instead of doing justice to these soldiers, the Senator from Mississippi wants to reduce taxes on the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD the letter from the Interior Department to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions regarding this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 9, 1928.

Hon. ARTHUR R. ROBINSON,
Chairman Committee on Pensions, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR ROBINSON: I am in receipt of your letter, inclosing a copy of bill S. 1880, granting increase of pensions to soldiers, sailors, and marines of the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition, and to widows, children, and dependent relatives of said soldiers, sailors, and marines, and granting pensions to World War veterans, and for other purposes, concerning which you ask for a report.

Section 1 of the bill increases the rate of pension of soldiers, sailors, and marine of the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition, their widows, children, and dependent relatives, to the rates granted on account of service during the Civil War.

Existing laws provide as follows:

	Per month
Civil War survivors:
If in a National or State soldiers' home	$50
If not in a National or State soldiers' home	65
If totally helpless or blind or so nearly so as to require the regular personal aid and attendance of another person	72
If totally helpless or blind and in a National or State soldiers' home	72
If totally helpless or blind and not in a National or State soldiers' home	90
Survivors, including nurses, war with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and China relief expedition:
Disability proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support	20–50
If regular aid and attendance of another person needed or required and not in a State or National soldiers' home	72
If regular aid and attendance of another person needed or required and in a State or National soldiers' home	50
Age, regardless of physical condition:
62 years	20
68 years	30
72 years	40
75 years	50
Dependent parents:
Civil War	30
War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and China relief expedition	20

Widows and minor children receive the same rate, whether Civil War or war with Spain service; that is, $30 per month plus $6 per month for each minor child under 16 years of age.

There are approximately 150,000 survivors and 250 nurses of the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition now on the rolls at the varying rates above indicated. To increase these to the rates now paid to the Civil War pensioners would cost approximately $63,350,000.

Section 2 of the bill grants title to any soldier, sailor, marine, or nurse, entitled to the benefits of the World War compensation act as amended, their widows, children, or dependent relatives, and at the rates now provided for service during the war with Spain, the pension therein provided being in addition to all other pensions, bounties, and compensations granted on account of service in the military or naval forces during the World War; that is, for survivors at rates from $20 to $30 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support; or if by reason of physical or mental disabilities, regular aid and attendance of another person is needed or required, at $72 per month, provided the disabilities are not the result of vicious habits and the applicant is not an inmate of a State or national soldiers' home; or, regardless of physical condition, for attained ages, as above specified; widows and children at $30 per month, plus $6 for each additional child under 16 years, and dependent parents at the rate of $20 per month.

Approximately 3,400,000 veterans of the World War and 110,000 dependents have been awarded adjusted compensation. Assuming that 10 per cent of the survivors have at least a 10 per cent disability, thereby entitling them to $20 per month under the bill, and that all the dependents would be eligible to the proposed pension, the cost of this item would be approximately $73,800,000.

* * * * * * *

The approximate aggregate cost of the bill would be $137,150,000.

I am unable to recommend that this bill be enacted into law.

A copy of this report was forwarded to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who advises that the proposed legislation is in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I was somewhat surprised at some of the utterances of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], and I was not surprised at other utterances of the Senator. I know that there are some things about which he and I are in disagreement, and there are other propositions on which we have joined battle lines together.

I was surprised at that part of the Senator's speech referring to the soldiers of the country, and seeking to give the impression that I was opposed to that body of our citizens being taken care of by reasonable and adequate appropriations. The Senator knows I have never voted against an appropriation to take care of the needs of the soldiers of this country.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am very much delighted to hear those remarks from the Senator, and I will say to him that if he will lead his side of the Chamber, we can get votes on this side to pass that pension bill right now, and eat up $140,000,000 of tax reduction.

Mr. HARRISON. So, Mr. President, I have always tried to vote to take care of the needs of those who fought for this country. I admire the gallantry and the fine war services rendered by the distinguished Senator from Iowa; but when the Senator from Iowa criticizes me for my views with reference to tax reduction, I am complimented that I find myself at variance with his views.

The Senator stated, in answer to a question which I propounded to him, that he was against any tax reduction. By his vote two years ago he indicated that he was against any tax reduction then. He also stated in his speech that he would now increase the surtaxes in the higher brackets to 40 per cent if it were within his power. I doubt not that the Senator would go even higher than that and vote for the old war-time surtaxes and make the rate 65 per cent.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator is in error as to the surtaxes. I was talking only of the estate taxes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator then is in favor of the present surtax in the higher brackets?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am in favor of a surtax; yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I know; but there is a great deal of difference between that and being in favor of the rate in the present law. Is the Senator in favor of the rate of surtax in the higher brackets as in the law? [After a pause.] The Senator does not know what the rate is now, does he?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; I am not familiar with it.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought so. Very often we hear men discuss on the floor of the Senate something about which they know absolutely nothing, and here is the Senator criticizing me for votes cast in the past and for my views with reference to tax reduction when he does not know what the surtax is in the higher brackets in the present law.

That is just carrying out my idea as to the Senator's information. I asked the Senator as to the pending amendment, which is the amendment reported by the committee reducing surtaxes, and the Senator said he was not familiar with that amendment. I asked him whether he was for the amendment or for the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina and he said he did not know. I am not surprised because he did not know anything about this subject matter.

That was a frank admission. Then, after he stated he did not know what was the issue here, he admitted that he was for the committee amendment.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; and the Senator forgot I indicated I was against the entire bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; the Senator said he was against the whole bill. In other words, he is "agin" everything except, I believe, that he would repeal the present estate tax law, although he paid high eulogy to the distinguished Congressman from Iowa, who was recently chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and who not only conceived but put through the House that law. The Senator from Iowa is blowing hot and cold by paying high tribute to the Congressman from Iowa and yet condemning his handiwork. The whole coalition over there, as I understand—and the Senator can deny it if he will—and the reason why he is voting with them over there is because there is some understanding with reference to the estate tax.

Mr. BROOKHART. I must correct the Senator in reference to Congressman Green's position. He opposed any change in the estate tax law as ardently as it was possible for him to do.

Mr. HARRISON. Congressman Green conceived, as I understand, the present plan and engineered it through the House, and it is now the law. At any rate he got that credit.

Mr. BROOKHART. Congressman Green opposed the rebate entirely, but it was forced upon him. Recently we had a discussion here in which it was said that he was elevated to the bench because he had opposed the rebate plan.

Mr. HARRISON. That is immaterial. The Senator started out by quoting from a speech I made on Saturday. Really, I am sorry that he did not read more of it, because it was a good speech. When the Senator quotes from me he is then making a good speech. It is only when he gets away from quoting me that he falls into error. He was defending the proposition that he and his friends were not backsliding, but that I was backsliding, and then he began to talk about the estate tax. I have been consistent in my position with reference to the estate tax. I have never backslidden at all on the estate tax. My position is known by my votes and by my utterances. I do not believe in double taxation. I voted against the imposition of the estate tax by the Federal Government. I voted not only once but many times for the repeal of the estate tax.

I am delighted that it was not put in this bill. It is not in this bill at this time. The House has not touched the estate-tax feature of the law at all. The Senate Committee on Finance, when it first took action, voted to repeal it on the recommendation of the Treasury Department, but when they found that there was a threat in the Senate that if they brought out a provision repealing the estate tax there would be a filibuster employed and that tax reduction would be denied to the American taxpayers, they changed their tactics. When they were served with notice by those who will be in conference upon the part of the House that if we touched the estate tax in the Senate, if we repealed the estate tax, there would be no tax reduction at all at this time, then it was that the majority members of the committee turned about face, rescinded the action they had taken in the Finance Committee, and so there is no question pending here with reference to estate taxes.

I feel at this time that if the proposition should arise, that I do not think I would join in for a repeal of it on this bill because of circumstances surrounding the question. I am going to do nothing that will prevent tax reduction during this session. I fear that will. My position has been entire consistent.

Now, coming to the proposition of the Senator about the great fight we had made on this side of the Chamber in 1921 and 1924 against Mr. Mellon and against those in the Senate who thought as he did with reference to reduction of surtaxes, the Senator said that I changed my position in 1926. No; I have never changed my position. I have certain views with respect to tax reduction. Those views are the views for which my party has ever stood. That is, that in the granting of reductions we should first give relief to those who need it most. That has been the policy of my colleagues in the House and of my colleagues in the Senate. Our record has been made. It was because Mr. Mellon would have the favored rich get the greatest reduction and refuse it to those who need it most, that we battled him in 1921 and again in 1924. It was in that suggestion, where the Secretary of the Treasury and you on that side tried to give 1,200 of the 3,585,895 income-tax payers in America 51 per cent of the total reduction.

It was in the benign pages of that proposal that incomes of $5,000,000 were to be benefited by a reduction of $1,335,832, while incomes of $3,000 were to receive only $8.75 reduction. This Senate amendment is patterned from the same plate and italicized from the same idea.

It was under the whip and spur and united effort of Senators on this side of the aisle that we forced consideration in 1921 and again in 1924 of tax reductions to eliminate millions from the payment of normal taxes, to eliminate millions from the payment of surtaxes in the lower brackets, and to relieve many millions more by giving reductions, not as great in the higher brackets as Mr. Mellon and those who believed as he did in the Senate and in the House wanted, but we relieved them appreciably. This was done under the influence of the Democratic minority in the House and in the Senate, and ours is the credit more than those on the other side of the aisle. What was done we forced to be done. We did not give in 1924 the reduction to 20 per cent, may I say to the Senator, which is the present rate in the higher brackets, until we had eliminated from the payment of taxes the millions of whom I have spoken, and the other millions who had had their taxes reduced in the lower brackets.

Upon what theory of government is it that a man should sit here in the Senate of the United States and, when we have surpluses piled up in the Treasury, continue to keep the taxes high just because he has the power to do it? Taxes should not be levied except in sufficient amount to run the Government. When we do not need the taxes why should we continue to impose them? I would not vote to increase the taxes now in the higher brackets, although I am opposed to reducing them in the higher brackets at this time. I hope the time will come when we can give a further reduction in the higher brackets, but that time is not here now. So when there is a surplus, as there is now a surplus, amounting last year to $400,000,000, and every reason to believe it will be a like sum this year, we must reduce taxes, and the question presented to us is where we shall cut.

We on this side of the Chamber believe in reducing the taxes for those who have had the least cutting of taxes in the past, and that is why we started in the beginning to eliminate the nuisance taxes, the war-time taxes that were never known by this Government except when our Government had been thrust into the midst of war. We have made our efforts to do away with those taxes. In some instances we succeeded and in others we have failed.

If it had not been for our aggressiveness and our united efforts the tax on automobile parts would not now be eliminated from the bill. I dare say that the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] knows that to be quite true, because he was the only member of the Finance Committee on the Republican side who in the beginning favored the elimination at this time of the tax on automobile parts. We Democrats were united on the proposition, and it was a Republican fear that they would be defeated on the floor of the Senate if they rejected our proposal which caused them finally to agree to eliminate the proposition.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to be clear in my mind about this matter. As I understand the Senator from Mississippi, the Republicans were not willing to have the tax taken off of automobiles, and it was only as a result of the persistence of Democrats that the change resulted in the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. On a record vote in the committee they voted us down, and even when the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] voted with us, we were unable to carry the proposition. The only reason why they turned turtle on the proposition was because they knew they could not stand the assault in the Senate, and that the tax would be eliminated on the floor of the Senate. Two years ago, in consideration of the 1926 tax bill, we made a proposal to eliminate this tax. We voted the proposition out here. On this side of the aisle we voted solidly to repeal the automobile tax, but many Senators on the other side of the Chamber voted against us. Theirs were the only votes that were recorded against it, but there was a sufficient number over there to retain, finally, the tax. I think my friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], who took occasion to criticize me this morning, voted with us on that question when we put it over in the Senate at that time.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I did not quite understand the Senator's proposition.

Mr. HARRISON. Two years ago the automobile tax came up for elimination. The Senator voted with us on that, I think.

Mr. BROOKHART. I may have voted for that, possibly, but I voted against the whole bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; the Senator voted against the whole bill. He voted against the whole proposition. But after we had passed the amendment eliminating the automobile tax and the bill went to conference, then it was that the conferees repudiated what the Senate did. Mr. Mellon said, "Oh, the Treasury will not stand for it. You have written a bill that reduces taxes nearly $500,000,000, and the Treasury will stand for only about $300,000,000. You must eliminate that provision whereby you take the tax off of automobiles." Senators relied on the recommendation and statement of the Treasury Department and were forced to recede from the action of the Senate. The Senator from Utah was then chairman of the conference and the first to retreat. When the bill was finally incorporated into law that tax was restored.

Notwithstanding the advice given by the Secretary of the Treasury, which was relied upon by Republican Senators, that we could not cut the tax any further than he said and notwithstanding that we reduced the taxes $383,000,000, there was a surplus at that time in the Treasury of over $300,000,000 and the next year it climbed until it reached over $600,000,000.

Those are the facts, and they will not be denied, and yet the Senator from Iowa says the Democrats should not have reduced the surtaxes. In 1926 we undertook to reduce them, and it was our amendments to the bill relating to the reduction of the surtaxes that were finally adopted in the committee. It was our appeals which brought about and gave great reductions to millions of moderate means. Yes; we had reduced it some in the higher brackets, but the Treasury could stand for that cut.

Here are corporations, as I have pointed out, which the Senator from Iowa says I am defending. That is all right. I am glad the time has come in America when every institution and every class of people can be defended, as they ought to be defended, when they are in the right. My party believes in equal and exact justice to every man in every class of business in the country, and as long as a corporation confines itself within the law I care not how big and prosperous it may become. I want to see it treated fairly.

Corporations are no bugaboo to us as Democrats. Treat them decently, treat them fairly, and do not look at them as though they were assassins, as my friend from Iowa would. He is obsessed against corporations. The man who has a little money, made by his own efforts and zeal, should pay it all to the Government, according to the Senator's theory. That is not my idea of government. That is not my philosophy of life. Deal equitably with all men; deal impartially with all of our citizens. Corporations are but aggregations of individuals who subscribe to the stock of the corporations and own it.

People in New York own stock in corporations in my State; people in my State own stock in corporations in Michigan. Upon them depends in a large degree the prosperity of the country. If we have a great surplus in the Treasury, why should we want to destroy them and at the same time destroy the business of the country? No; as I pointed out on Saturday in 1909 there was only a 1 per cent corporation tax levied upon the corporations of the country, and during the World War we shot it up from 2 per cent until we had levied a 12½ per cent corporation tax, an excess-profits tax in addition to that, and in addition to all that a capital stock tax. There is no class of people in America from whom more taxes were exacted during the war than the stockholders of corporations, and yet despite that high increase from 1 per cent corporation tax to 12½ per cent two years ago, in peace times, the majority of the Republican Party increased it to 13½ per cent, when we were reducing the taxes of everybody else.

I say, Mr. President, since we have reduced the tax on individual incomes, since we have lowered the normal tax, since we have eliminated millions in the lower brackets from the payment of the surtax, the time has come when the stockholders of the corporations of the country are entitled to some tax reduction. So we on this side of the Chamber put the question to the Senate as to whether or not it would reduce the corporation tax to 11½ per cent as the other House had voted to do. There was not a division in the House on that proposition. The Republicans from the Senator's own State, Democrats from my State, all unitedly voted to put into this proposed law a reduction of the corporation tax to 11½ per cent; and yet on the roll call the distinguished Senator from Iowa and all Senators on the other side of the Chamber unitedly voted against that proposition and made the tax on corporations 12½ per cent.

Yes; I am glad to defend my position with reference to it. I wish that the Treasury of this Government were in such condition that we could reduce the corporation tax to 10 per cent, or to 8 per cent, aye, I wish the time would come when we can bring the tax back to the pre-war days of only 1 per cent. The American people, I do not care whether they live in Iowa or in New York or in Mississippi, do not get much pleasure out of paying taxes; no one does; a tax is a burden; and I say that the broad shoulders of the highly favored few should carry the burden more than the bowed and bent backs of the moderately well-to-do many of this country. That is the position of the Democratic Party; that is our record in this body. I do not believe in destroying any kind of business except the kind that is illegitimate, the kind that, through the violation of laws, saps the lifeblood out of the Nation, and fetters with chains of bondage our own citizens.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STECK in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Does it not strike the Senator from Mississippi as strange that our friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], who is devotedly interested in the welfare of the farmer, should be anxious to have taxes remain high? That certainly means, to me at least, that every article that the farmer buys from the manufacturer, every article that the household purchases, will be increased in price by reason of the high tax. The people pay the tax. It does not come out of the rich man's pocket; he does not go out and pick up a chest of gold somewhere to pay the tax. The manufacturer charges it against the people, and the farmers of the West, who are seeking relief, are going to be relieved just as much from the lowering of taxation as any other citizens of the country are going to be benefited by it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from New York is exactly right. The higher corporation taxes are the more the purchaser will have to pay for the products made by corporations.

Mr. President, let me say a few words more in regard to the corporation tax. The Senator from Iowa asked why not help the farmers in some way? I want to help the farmers. I have always helped them. Through proposed legislation and otherwise I have pursued that course. I should like to vote to reduce the tariff rates that are now bleeding the American farmer and other citizens of this country to the amount of $4,000,000,000 annually in increased high costs; but what can we do on that question in the Senate, may I ask the Senator? We can not originate that kind of legislation, nor do we control the machinery that grinds it out. And what would his colleagues over there do with reference to that particular matter?

I am not unaware that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] has offered an amendment to this bill on the tariff question. I am opposed to that amendment, and when it shall be offered I will state the reasons for my opposition, and I think then the Senator from Wisconsin will also be against the proposal. I am honestly and sincerely in favor of a tax reduction bill. I want to see taxes reduced by $300,000,000 or $325,000,000, if possible, but if we can not get such a reduction as that because of the circumstances here and our minority position, then I am in favor of getting the most we can. If the utmost is only $200,000,000, well and good; but I am not in favor of the Senate of the United States doing anything that will defeat the final passage of the pending revenue measure. There are many provisions in it that will give some relief; and I am not going to be a party to accepting amendments offered by certain Senators who are in favor of taking all the surplus and paying the national debt without giving any reduction of taxation to the American taxpayer.

Do not let the Senator fool himself that a 13½ per cent or a 12½ per cent corporation tax does not increase the cost of living in this country. The Senator may get it into his head that only the rich in this country own stock in corporations, but it is estimated—the figures vary—that millions of people hold stock in corporations, and I know that when a corporation has to pay a 12½ per cent tax or a 13½ per cent tax it must make it up and that it makes it up by increasing the price of its products to those who buy them.

I know that there are many corporations which give to their employees shares of stock. Many of them are doing that. Those working for the corporations are interested, and I know that when a corporation has got to pay 12½ or 13½ per cent as a corporation tax it is very likely to reduce wages of the men, when it can do so, who work in the particular industry.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me, inasmuch as the Government has increased the corporation tax from 1 per cent in 1909 to 13½ per cent in 1926, the least we can do is to reduce it to 11½ per cent. That was the proposition that was before the Senate. I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I care to reply to but one or two of the suggestions made by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi. In the first place, his argument, as suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], is to the effect that the corporations add their tax to the price of their products and pass it on to the farmer; in other words, the corporations pay no tax. There is some truth in that in reference to the big corporations, but the 177,000 corporations that have operated at a loss since 1922 have passed nothing on to the farmer. The corporation tax should be graduated so that could not be done, but under the plan the Senator is proposing there is no such graduation.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I know he wants to be absolutely fair. Let me say that in the proposal we made on last Saturday to give a reduction of 5, 7, and 9 per cent to corporations whose net incomes were less than $15,000 there was carried out the idea of a graduation which gave greater relief to the smaller corporations; but the Senator cast his vote against the proposition.

Mr. BROOKHART. That would not give any relief to the small corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish the Senator from Utah would permit me to ask the Senator from Iowa why the tax proposed will not give any relief to the smaller corporations.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have yielded to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator from Utah allow the Senator from Iowa to make an explanation? I want the explanation of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should prefer to do my own yielding.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, one thing that will happen if the graduated tax shall be adopted will be that all chain stores in the United States, in all the little cities wherever they may be located, are not going to pay the 12½ per cent tax; but they are going to take advantage of the graduated tax. There has already been adopted by the Senate a resolution providing for an investigation of those very stores, it being claimed that they are interfering with legitimate business men of the country; and, just as certain as we live, if the graduated tax becomes a part of this bill as proposed they are going all to fall under the lower brackets.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I was not able to be here on Saturday when that amendment was discussed, but it occurred to me as I read the text of it that it ought to be called "An amendment for the relief of the Standard Oil Co.," because they can create a separate corporation for every gasoline station; and by this amendment that the Senate put in on Saturday they are going to get away with a 5 or a 7 per cent tax instead of a 12½ per cent tax.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will not the Senator yield now so that I can ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Just one question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor. Does the Senator yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from Utah to finish his statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I had one of the experts in the Government service engaged since Saturday up to the present time in trying to figure out what that amendment really means, and as nearly as he can figure it will be over $50,000,000; and who is going to benefit?

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator conferred with Mr. McCoy, the actuary?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not seen Mr. McCoy.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will not accept his figures on the proposition. With whom has the Senator conferred who gave him those figures?

Mr. SMOOT. An official of the Government.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator must have been playing mumblety-peg with himself.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish the Senator would play mumblety-peg sometimes instead of making the statements that he makes. I think it would be to the advantage of the Government of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I would rather work with the Actuary of the Treasury Department. May I ask the Senator a question in the time of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Was the purpose of the Senator in throwing himself into this breach and answering questions for the Senator from Iowa, when he employed the chain-store argument and the Senator from Pennsylvania employed the Standard Oil argument, merely to hold the Senator from Iowa in line on this proposition?

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the least. The Senator from Iowa is in line just as strongly as any Senator in this body.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator wants to hold him there?

Mr. SMOOT. I am sure he thinks for himself; and if any statement made by the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Pennsylvania was not approved by the Senator from Iowa, he would say so and act in accordance therewith.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I have the attention of the Senator from Utah? As I understand the Senator's argument, it is that a graduated income corporation tax will result in the breaking up of the big trusts and combines and result in the formation of small unit corporations. I should like to know if that is not going to be a public benefit. For local control, knowledge of ownership, and for levying State and municipal taxes it will be an advantage.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah never made any such statement. The Senator from Utah thinks these chain stores are small units in almost every little city that there is in the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator, I understood, stated that they would incorporate in small units, so as to get the benefit of the low tax upon small incomes.

Mr. SMOOT. And make their returns, perhaps, in affiliated returns, owned by the same identical people, the same percentage owned in every institution.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But is it not true that they can not get the benefit of this graduated corporation income tax unless their income is small; and to get a small income they will break up into small corporations, small units?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what they are doing to-day.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will not the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to answer the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts myself about that breaking up and the effect of it on these great corporations.

I helped conduct the first hearing against the Standard Oil Co. down in Kansas City, Mo., when the proceedings were started which finally resulted in its dissolution; and after we dissolved it it was worse than it was before. There has got to be something more effective than the mere breaking up of big corporations because there are other powers, when they are broken up, which enable them, providing they are under the same sympathetic management, to engage in less competition and make more profits from the people than they did before.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is all as simple as A, B, C. If they own a hundred gasoline stations, they organize a hundred subsidiary corporations. They own all the stock of every one of them; but those 100 corporations make separate accountings and they get in under the benefits of this amendment adopted here last Saturday, on the theory that they are small corporations, and the benefit all goes to the parent corporation which owns their stock.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BROOKHART. Just a moment.

The Senator from Massachusetts himself suggested that we had reached a stage in the creation of these corporations where as monstrous a thing as that just described by the Senator from Pennsylvania can be done, and I believe that is true. Until we have regulated these corporations by a law that reaches their profits—there is no other place to touch a corporation—and that graduates their tax according to their rate of profit, we have accomplished nothing by the amendments which have been suggested by the Senator from Mississippi.

Now I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is rather late to make the observation, but do I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania as making the point that because the people who own these service stations in copartnership, probably, or in cooperation with the Standard Oil Co. would get the benefit of these graduated rates, we are to deny the same benefit to all the traders of the United States?

Mr. BROOKHART. As far as I am concerned, I would reach that conclusion. I am for taxing the higher rate of profits at a heavier tax than the lower rate of profits.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is in favor of a graduated tax, as I understand him.

Mr. BROOKHART. But not on the basis of the mere total earnings of any corporation. That does not get the results.

Mr. SIMMONS. That does not appeal to the Senator? The Senator does not favor a graduated tax upon the incomes of corporations up to $15,000?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I believe in a graduated tax on the incomes of corporations.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what this bill does.

Mr. BROOKHART. But it does not do it on the basis in which I believe.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that the Senator now is discussing the corporate tax, not the individual surtax. He is discussing the corporate tax; and what is done by the amendment that the Senate agreed to on Saturday is simply to graduate the tax on incomes of $15,000 or less.

Mr. BROOKHART. But it is on the basis of the total income.

Mr. SIMMONS. On the basis of the total income.

Mr. BROOKHART. And that is not a fair basis of graduation. The right basis is the rate of return on the capital investment. Whenever the Senator brings in a graduated tax of that kind I will stand for it. I have talked it out many times with the late Senator Jones of New Mexico. I was in complete accord with his ideas; but the amendments offered here are not of that character.

What do I mean by that? Here is a corporation earning 4 per cent on its honest capital, we will say. It should have a tax rate perhaps not above 2 per cent of that—a low tax rate. If it earns 4¼ per cent, the rate should be perhaps 3 per cent. If it earns 4½ per cent, it should be 4 per cent, or perhaps more. I am only using these rates by way of illustration; because after it goes above 5½ per cent, which is all the American people can produce, then the graduation should go still higher. I have no objection, a little above that, to taking all of the excess profits in taxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator would readjust all of our individual income-tax rates. They are based upon income, without reference to the amount of capital invested. I may have $100,000 invested in my farm; but if I do not make anything on it I have no income to be taxed, notwithstanding the investment that I have in it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I shall be glad to discuss that proposition with the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the basis upon which all of our legislation since the war with reference to individual income taxes and corporate taxes has been based. We have based it, not upon the capital invested, but upon the amount of net profits earned in the operation of the business in which that capital was invested.

Mr. BROOKHART. There are some cases where the same injustice applies as in the illustration the Senator has given, no doubt, and I am perfectly willing to correct those injustices; but there is no proposition of that kind here.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I did not interrupt the Senator for the purpose of that sort of a discussion. I had that sort of a discussion with the Senator from Michigan, and after we had had some discussion he seemed to yield the point and retire from the combat. I rose for the purpose of answering the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The Senator from Pennsylvania said that when we graduated this tax we allowed certain subsidiary companies, such as service station companies of the Standard Oil Co., to obtain some benefit. It may be, Mr. President, that the law which we have passed in order to give every little corporation in this country the benefit of these lower rates, where their income is less than $15,000, may result in some benefit to some corporation connected or affiliated in some way with the great trusts; but are we to deny relief to the masses of the people of this country because possibly and incidentally some little corporations organized as subsidiaries of these big trusts may get some benefit from it?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think with 177,000 out of 420,000 corporations operating at a loss, we are taking care of the little fellows. They are more than being taken care of by the big fellows now.

Mr. SIMMONS. If a man is operating at a loss, he has nothing that the Government ought to tax.

Mr. BROOKHART. No; he has nothing, and it is these big combinations that are forcing him to operate at a loss; and if we allow them to break up into little snakes, little subsidiaries that eat up the little independent ones still faster, we have gained nothing by that operation.

No; the Senator is on the wrong basis of graduation of corporation taxes. I am for it on the basis figured out by the late Senator Jones of New Mexico, whom I regarded as a very great expert upon this proposition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator appreciates, I have no doubt, the difficulties which were encountered, when the excess-profits tax was a part of our revenue system, in reaching these results, because of the almost insurmountable difficulties in determining valuations.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator will permit me, I mentioned that in the beginning. I concede that the administration of that kind of a law, as we create corporations in this wild and unrestricted fashion in the United States, is a difficult, almost impossible, proposition. I am ready to put regulations around these corporations that will give us control of their capitalization and control of their earnings, so that we can tax them as they ought to be taxed. We have not done that, however; and we will not have a graduated corporation tax law that is just or fair until we do our duty in that regard. I deplore the fact that the Congress of the United States lies back here helpless, powerless, and says, "We can do nothing," and allows these great corporations practically to rule the country, economically as well as politically.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that the plan which the Senator from New Mexico expounded to the Senate was presented to the Democrats, and in one of our conferences it commended itself to the judgment of the Democratic Party, and it was presented here to the Senate.

Mr. BROOKHART. I voted for it in 1924, and it passed the Senate.

Mr. KING. I know the Senator did; but I am just adverting to the fact that difficulties are encountered in enforcing that policy. I believe, however, apparently insuperable as those difficulties are, that it is a just system of taxation to graduate the taxes upon corporations as we graduate the taxes upon the earnings of individuals; and I think perhaps some formula might be worked out by which the valuation of properties could be ascertained in a just and fair way as a basis for the introduction into our revenue system of a graduated profits tax.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator will present it, I shall be only too glad to support it.

Mr. KING. May I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to conclude very soon.

Mr. KING. I do not want to misunderstand the attitude of the Senator. I rather got the view from his statement a moment ago that he doubted the practicability of enforcing any laws against mergers and corporations and trusts and monopolies.

Mr. BROOKHART. Not any law. If we go straight to the core of the matter I think we can draw a law that can be easily enforced. The trouble about it is that our laws do not go straight to the point.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Clayton Act, if properly interpreted and vigorously enforced, will rob these monopolies of the power which they are now exercising and, by the criminal processes and the injunctive processes of those acts, arrest their monopolistic course, which has so ruthlessly destroyed competition in many branches of industry?

Mr. BROOKHART. That would help some; but the "ifs" the Senator has put in his statement are mountain high. I do not know whether we could even fly to them.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows there are "ifs" in many things in life and in the administration of laws; and many laws which are just and intended to accomplish social and political reform fail in their purpose because not enforced. The trouble with many governments is that when laws have been enacted which have teeth in them and they are not enforced, demands for additional laws are made, and when responded to and these laws fail, still others are demanded, until we have mountains of laws and statutes upon statutes. If the earlier laws were applied the evils sought to be corrected would have disappeared.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator is right in that proposition. With reference to this matter of passing these taxes on to the consumer all the time, if they were able to do that without question, as the Senator from Mississippi has suggested, the United States Chamber of Commerce would not be before Congress asking for tax reduction. It would be perfectly satisfied with the situation, because it would add in the tax in all cases, and then add in a profit for adding it in, and charge it all up to the people of the country. But they do not succeed in that result so fully, and the fact is that they have to pay some of these taxes. Therefore I think the argument upon that proposition falls.

In conclusion—and I am sorry the Senator from Mississippi ran away; it seems impossible for me to keep him in the Chamber—in the beginning of this session we passed a resolution, introduced by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. McMASTER], in which we declared for tariff reduction at this session of Congress, and the Senator from Mississippi voted for it. Now he announces that if that is offered by the Senator from South Dakota as an amendment to this tax bill he will vote against it. Who has done the backsliding on this tax question?

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, transmitted the resolution (H. Res. 204) of the House adopted as a tribute to the memory of Hon. LADISLAS LAZARO, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

The message also announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 3565) to provide compensation for disability or death resulting from injury to employees in certain employments in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 777) making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War, and it was signed by the Vice President.

MEDICAL OFFICER ASSIGNED TO WHITE HOUSE

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3456) allowing the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army, to the medical officer assigned to duty as personal physician to the President, which was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "serving," to insert a colon and "Provided, That the officer now assigned to that duty shall have the rank, pay, and allowances herein provided from the date of his assignment."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator if, after the officer assigned to this position ceases to occupy it, he will still have the same rank, pay, and allowances?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The bill as passed by the Senate and by the House provides that he shall have temporary rank while so serving.

Mr. KING. And the same will be the case with regard to pay and allowances?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The same with pay and allowances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

GOV. ALFRED E. SMITH

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I brought to the attention of the Senate and of the country last Saturday the fact that Mr. Van Namee, a member of the Public Service Commission of New York State, appointed by Governor Smith in 1924 for a term of 10 years, is managing Governor Smith's campaign for the Presidency. I want to read the testimony, in brief, on that phase of this matter:

The CHAIRMAN. One of the members of the committee suggests that I ask one further question. Are you a member of the public utilities commission at this time?

Mr. VAN NAMEE. I am a member of the public service commission. I have been since June or July, 1924.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an appointee of Governor Smith, are you not?

Mr. VAN NAMEE. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an appointive position?

Mr. VAN NAMEE. Yes, sir; confirmed by the Senate of the State of New York.

Senator BARKLEY. What is the length of the term?

Mr. VAN NAMEE. Ten years.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is the chief office or headquarters of the commission?

Mr. VAN NAMEE. At Albany, the capital.

So Mr. Van Namee has left his headquarters, his official station, and has gone down to New York City to take personal charge of the campaign of Governor Smith.

Mr. President, I mentioned here Saturday the fact that we had another case on all fours with the case of Frank Smith, of Illinois, a Republican. One of the chief things that caused me to oppose seating him in this body was the fact that while occupying a place on the utilities commission in Illinois Frank Smith was supported by Mr. Insull, the power king of Illinois. Mr. Insull was contributing money to Smith's campaign fund—tremendous sums. Mr. Frank Smith was rendering decisions, as an official of Illinois, paying back many times over to Mr. Insull the amount Insull was contributing to him. So we had the awful and ugly situation, where the power king outside was raising his rates upon the consumers of Illinois, and Mr. Smith, on the inside, as a State official, was rendering decrees that Mr. Insull wanted rendered, approving the increase of rates upon the consumers of hydroelectric power, which put that money back many times over into the pocket of Mr. Insull. No honest man can indorse such miserable and corrupt doings.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not wish to project myself into any controversy or into the discussion. I feel, however, notwithstanding my attitude toward the Smith case, that perhaps in the interest of fairness and accuracy it ought to be said that the Public Utilities Commission in Illinois, during a number of years after the appointment of Mr. Smith, lowered the rates upon public utilities, as I remember now, $14,000,000. It has been some time since I read the record and I may not speak accurately, and if I am wrong I shall be glad to correct the statement. I thought in fairness I ought to call the attention of the Senator to that fact.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in numbers of instances after Mr. Insull commenced to contribute large sums of money to Mr. Frank Smith's senatorial campaign Mr. Smith increased the rates, and Mr. Insull took in large sums of money because of Mr. Smith's action in the matter. Governor Smith's case is on all fours with that of Frank Smith. The man he appointed to office on the same kind of commission, a powerful commission, which holds the power of life and death over the corporate interests of New York State, has it in his power to increase or lower rates, to approve contracts or disapprove them, and he is taken away from the capital at Albany and put in charge of the campaign headquarters at the Biltmore Hotel to gather in campaign funds for Governor Smith.

Mr. President, I submit that that is exactly parallel with the case where the judge of a court, with a number of people who have cases before him, civil and criminal, have an agent of the judge to come to them and ask for campaign contributions to help reelect the judge to the office he holds. Most of those people would make some contribution, and that deal, if it were put over, would be a shocking, astounding, and criminal act.

Governor Smith has picked out the man of all men appointed by him with power to influence, yes, and to coerce, contributions to Governor Smith's campaign. Mr. Kenny, a rich contractor in New York, a man who has made his hundreds of thousands, his millions, and his tens of millions, in the contracting business in New York City and State. Van Namee sits back in the Smith headquarters, while Kenny is out on the highways and the byways gathering up campaign funds. Mr. Kenny admits that he gave $20,000 and that he loaned $50,000 to Mr. Van Namee for Governor Smith.

Senators, I wonder how many are going to get into this debate on this subject before this matter is over. I wonder how many Senators are going to be able to explain to their constituents that they sat idly by when this phase of the matter was being discussed, when an effort was being made to put the high office of President upon the auction block and barter it to the highest bidder.

Van Namee holds this power. Kenny will go from him to a corporate concern—a street-car company, a railway company, or any other company—and no doubt say, "Mr. Van Namee would like for you to contribute $10,000 or $50,000 or $100,000. Do not send it to him or give it to me, but give it to John Jones at a certain address in this city, and he will send it to North Carolina, or to some other point, and no account will be kept of it, and we will not have to report it." Senators, that is what is going on I am told. They made the very startling statement, the astounding statement, that they had gathered up and expended only $103,000. It would come nearer being $10,000,000 than the amount they named.

I wonder if we are going to permit this to continue, and let them with their pussyfooting scheme accumulate millions to buy the nomination? I am not in favor of any Democrat buying it, I am not in favor of any Republican buying the Republican nomination. I fight corruption in both parties wherever I find it, it does not make any difference with me whether a man is a Democrat or a Republican. When I was convinced that Governor Harding, of my State, appointed by President Wilson head of the Federal Reserve Board, had gone into a conspiracy with the Republican leaders and Wall Street financiers to wreck that banking system and produce a panic, I laid siege to him in the Senate, and I drove him off the Federal Reserve Board in a fight I conducted here for two years.

It did not make any difference to me that he had been a Democrat, and was appointed by President Wilson, a Democrat. I said it is more my duty as a Democrat to clean crooked Democrats out of our ranks than it is particularly to go after crooked Republicans. Each party ought to get rid of that kind of men in its ranks.

Day by day I am going to bring this scandalous matter to the attention of the Senate, and I want to ask the investigating committee publicly to summon Jesse Jones, of Texas, and ask him about contributions; to summon Thomas F. Ryan, of New York; to summon William G. McAdoo, and ask him if he knows anything in connection with this matter, or can give the committee any light, or can point his finger toward where important things can be found out. I want them to bring Mr. Van Namee and Mr. Kenny back again for some more questioning, and I want us to get a list from Mr. Kenny of the big contractors in New York City and State, so that we can interrogate them.

Mr. President, we have been sent here to faithfully guard the interests of this Nation, to protect it from misrule and abuse, and to keep it clear of corruption. Now, when two candidates are literally trying to buy the Presidency we ought certainly to be on our guard. I think Mr. Hoover is spending a vast sum of money in his effort to obtain the Republican nomination, and we know what is going on with Governor Smith's Roman machine. Look what it did to JIM REED up in Wisconsin. He polled 35,000 votes, Smith polled about 8,000, but in an evil hour somehow the Smith machine got in its work and hooked the delegation away for Smith.

I have a great deal of confidence in this committee. I hope the members of it will not be timid. I know that when it is all over they will not want anybody asking questions as to why they did not inquire into this and inquire into that. I know of a lot of information that is going to be given to them and suggestions that are going to be made. I will help them all I can from time to time. I make that promise now.

When I voted in the Senate to deny Frank Smith a seat in this body it was mainly because he used Insull's money to obtain the Republican nomination for the Senate in his State and in return corrupted his office as utility commissioner and laid the burden of increased light and power rates upon the consumers of that State. It appeared on its face to be a corrupt deal, and I would not stand for it. Other Senators felt as I did about it. When Governor Smith, of New York, running for the Democratic nomination for President, appoints a member of his Tammany Roman machine to the office of public utilities commissioner or public service commissioner—the same thing, because Van Namee's work is the same kind of work that Frank Smith did—and when he or his friends select that State officer, with all his great power over the business enterprises of New York State, to go out and get contributions for Governor Smith's campaign, it is time for honest Democrats who love their party and their country to pause and ask themselves the questions: Can we afford to permit this man, with his conception of civic virtues, as shown by this unfortunate, ugly, and brazen act of his, and by his utter lack of appreciation of the desire and importance of preserving American ideals and institutions in their true American form, to become, through the secret and lavish use of money and corrupt campaign methods, the leader of the party of Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson? No. And they are not going to do it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed, without amendment, to the following concurrent resolutions of the Senate:

S. Con. Res. 6. Concurrent resolution to print and bind the proceedings in Congress together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall of the statue of Alexander Hamilton Stephens, presented by the State of Georgia; and

S. Con. Res. 18. Concurrent resolution to provide for the printing of the report of the Federal Commission on Cooperative Marketing of Farm Products.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

EAST PORTLAND-ROSEVILLE RAILROAD IN OREGON AND CALIFORNIA

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STECK in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3699) for the relief of the land-grant railroad operated between the station formerly known as East Portland, in the State of Oregon, and Roseville, in the State of California, which were, on page 1, line 6, to strike out the words "the same"; on page 1, line 7, after the word "States," to insert "at the same rate"; and on page 1, line 10, after "278)," to insert "Provided, That the Congress hereby reserves the right at any time by law to prescribe such charges as it deems advisable for such Government transportation."

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

TIMBER AND OTHER FOREST PRODUCTS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3556) to insure adequate supplies of timber and other forest products for the people of the United States, to promote the full use for timber growing and other purposes of forest lands in the United States, including farm wood lots and those abandoned areas not suitable for agricultural production, and to secure the correlation and the most economical conduct of forest research in the Department of Agriculture, through research in reforestation, timber growing, protection, utilization, forest economics, and related subjects, and for other purposes, which was, on page 5, line 2, after the word "States," to insert ", and in addition to establish and maintain one such station for the intermountain region of Utah and adjoining States, one for Alaska, one in Hawaii, and one in the tropical possessions of the United States in the West Indies, and one additional station in the Southern States."

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]? I understand the amendment which the Senator proposes in behalf of the minority, with reference to the levying of surtaxes, is now before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know whether I have offered it formally yet or not. If I have not offered it, I will do so now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). The pending question is on the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand the number of surtax payers who are to benefit, if the amendment proposed by the majority of the Finance Committee prevails, is 125,000 individuals.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that is about the number.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would like to ask what number of individual taxpayers will benefit by having the surtax amendment, which the Senator has offered, indorsed or approved by the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not in a position to tell the Senator exactly the number.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. McCoy, the Treasury Actuary, tells me it will be 225,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is about my recollection.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the difference between those benefiting under the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, representing the minority of the committee, and under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, representing the majority of the committee, is the difference between 225,000 and 125,000 individual taxpayers. In other words, 100,000 more individual taxpayers who will benefit if the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina prevails?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is my understanding that 225,000 would get the total benefit under the minority plan of reduction. They are the relatively smaller taxpayers.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator another question about it? The Senator's amendment would reduce the surtaxes upon that class of individuals whose income is from $10,000 to $20,000 as well as those who have an income of over $20,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. While the proposal of the majority is that no benefit shall be given by a reduction of surtaxes to that group of individual taxpayers who have incomes between $10,000 and $20,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So that the additional advantage of the Senator's amendment is that it reaches a class of individual taxpayers who are now receiving or reporting incomes of between $10,000 and $20,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The third advantage, as I understand it, is that the Senator's amendment would give a reduced surtax to all taxpayers having incomes of between $10,000 and $70,000, while the amendment offered by the majority does not stop in the reduction of taxes at those who have incomes of $70,000, but reduces the taxes on the very rich taxpayers who have incomes in excess of $70,000, the theory of the Senator from North Carolina being that those taxpayers who have incomes of over $70,000 have already had a sufficient reduction. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is correct. The majority would give a reduction to everybody whose income exceeds $70,000 up to the peak of incomes listed for taxation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What sound opposition or argument can be made to the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, in view of the fact that it reaches a larger number of taxpayers and reaches that class of taxpayers who, most of all, need a tax reduction?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I am going to discuss now.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I direct the Senator's attention to this thought, which he will probably discuss. To my mind the Federal taxes bear most heavily and are most burdensome to-day, not in the amount that is paid but in the requirement to pay taxes at all, upon that class of professional and business men and women who receive incomes from investments that are within the income brackets between $10,000 and $20,000. They usually are professional men or small business men. They have families. They are educating their children. The cost of maintaining their standard of living is excessively high, and every dollar of tax is burdensome. It seems to me that that part of the Senator's amendment which would give some relief to that very large number of taxpayers—it must be nearly 100,000, according to the figures presented by the experts, who have incomes of between $10,000 and $20,000—makes the amendment proposed by him very much better and very much more desirable than the amendment offered by the majority.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in the beginning of this scheme of taxation I think we all agreed that income taxes should be based largely upon the principle of ability to pay. Tested by that rule, of course, the man of small income is entitled to the greatest consideration, because his ability to pay the tax is very much less than that of the big man. For instance, the man who receives an income of $10,000 has not the same ability to pay taxes as the man who receives an income of $100,000 or an income of $1,000,000.

Mr. President, I think the feeling of all of us is that, so far as is consistent with a reasonably clear presentation of the questions upon which the Senate is to vote, the exigencies of the situation are such that we should restrain and limit ourselves in debate to a discussion of such questions as are absolutely pertinent and supposed to be necessary in order to enlighten the Senate. Recognizing that fact, I propose to make my discussion of the surtax question as brief as I possibly can.

Ever since the passage of the act of 1926 there seems to have been an universal agreement upon one proposition, namely, that in the reduction made in that year the taxpayer in the lower brackets of the surtax schedule was not given his just proportion of the reduction then made. That opinion seems to have found approval finally even in the mind of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon.

This year, when it was proposed to formulate and enact another tax-reduction measure, the Secretary of the Treasury expressed his views with regard to the matter. I want to read from the Secretary's recommendation with regard to the new tax bill. His first recommendation is a tax upon corporations of 12 per cent. The committee has exceeded, therefore, and the Senate on Saturday when it voted on the corporation income-tax provision, exceeded by one-half of 1 per cent the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to the amount of that tax. That is to say, the committee and the Senate propose a reduction in corporation income taxes of $41,000,000 less than the Secretary of the Treasury himself recommended.

The second recommendation was with relation to surtaxes, and I will read it:

> That the rate applicable to the so-called intermediate brackets, running from $14,000 to $75,000 of the individual income tax, be revised in accordance with the attached table, resulting in a decrease in revenue of $50,000,000.

In view of what has transpired, that recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury is startling. He suggested that the reduction needed was within the brackets ranging between $14,000 and $75,000 and he recommended a reduction in the taxes within that range of $50,000,000. Later the committee acted and decided to reduce them only $25,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury not only recommended a reduction of $50,000,000 within these brackets, but the Treasury Department prepared a table covering it. I suppose that table was worked out by Mr. Ogden Mills in collaboration with the experts of the Treasury Department.

I have that table before me, Mr. President. It was prepared with a view to reducing the taxes on incomes between $14,000 and $75,000 to the extent of $50,000,000, but upon examination I find that it was so prepared that persons whose incomes are less than $70,000 would get $28,000,000 of reduction out of the $50,000,000, and persons whose incomes are in excess of $70,000 would get $22,000,000 out of the total $50,000,000 reduction proposed by the Treasury Department for those brackets.

I am not at all surprised that the Treasury Department in any scheme of reduction that it may propose should look out for those of large incomes, but the recommendation of the Treasury Department gives the impression that it intended this reduction in order to remedy an injustice which had been done to the taxpayers whose incomes range between $14,000 and $75,000.

Again, Mr. President, when the Finance Committee met to consider this bill, the majority members of the committee very kindly, through the able chairman of the committee, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] handed——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina permit an interruption at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Before the Senator takes up the discussion as to the action of the majority of the Finance Committee, is it not a fact that the House of Representatives rejected the proposal of the Treasury Department for any reduction in the surtaxes?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The bill came to the Senate from the House of Representatives making no provision for any reduction of surtaxes?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true.

Mr. SMOOT. But the same Secretary of the Treasury recommended that we retain the tax of $66,000,000 on automobiles, and we have taken that off. That same Secretary of the Treasury recommended that we retain the $17,000,000 derived from admission taxes, and that tax has also been taken off, as the bill has been reported to the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not now discussing the automobile tax or any other tax except the surtax, nor am I discussing the question of how much tax reduction the Treasury can stand. I am now discussing the question of the justice of giving those who have the smaller incomes the reduction to which they are entitled and which they did not get in 1926.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator from North Carolina think for a moment, if the Secretary of the Treasury had recommended the elimination of the tax of $66,000,000 on automobiles and of $17,000,000 on admissions, that he would have also recommended the reduction in the surtaxes?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know. The Secretary of the Treasury, through Mr. Mills, came before the Finance Committee and vigorously opposed the repeal of the automobile tax, but the Senator from Utah and his associates voted for the repeal.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; but the Senator from North Carolina is stating what the Secretary of the Treasury recommended. I say that the Secretary of the Treasury recommended that the $66,000,000 tax on automobiles be retained and that the $17,000,000 tax on admissions be retained; and if he had recommended the repeal of the automobile tax and the admissions tax he never would have recommended this amount of reduction on surtaxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not discussing that question at all. I am saying that the Secretary of the Treasury before the committee, before Congress had assembled, or when it had, perhaps, just assembled, made his recommendation. In that recommendation he recognized the fact that these small surtaxpayers had been done an injustice in the 1926 bill, and he recommended that that injustice be remedied. I am simply trying to get the Senate to realize the fact that even the Secretary of the Treasury recognized that injustice had been done this class of taxpayers. It is that injustice that we are now trying to remedy. The question of whether the condition of the Treasury will permit us to remedy it, has already been discussed. The question now is, Are they entitled to this remedy? The question of whether the Treasury can afford it we have already discussed. Senators on the other side contend that the Treasury can not afford to do justice to these small surtaxpayers. We contend that the Treasury can afford to do it.

The Treasury Department contend that they have a surplus of only about $400,000,000 for this year and $200,000,000 for next year available for tax reduction purposes. We have attempted to show, and I think successfully, that those estimates are entirely erroneous, as most of the other estimates made by the Treasury heretofore have been erroneous. In fact, all of the other estimates by the Treasury Department have been erroneous. But even if they are correct in the main, it has been shown that they are not correct with reference to certain other items that would make an additional margin of $160,000,000; and it has been pointed out further that by a proper application of the amount received from our foreign debtors we may release another $160,000,000 for tax reduction purposes.

As I started to say, when the committee met its chairman very kindly brought to the minority what was called the Republican program of tax reduction for this year. The committee had been in session; the minority had asked that they be given the room, and the majority had gone out, but we had requested them to give us the statement, and the chairman came and, as he will remember, submitted it in person. In that statement I find this clause:

> 5. Revision in surtax brackets from $18,000 to $76,000, $25,000,000.

My recollection is that in pursuance of that program of the majority the majority did present to the committee a reduction, which was almost identical with the proposition which I have submitted here, and that that was tentatively agreed upon. Subsequent to that time for some reason or other the majority, which at that time was willing to follow out the proposition that I stand for here and that the minority stands for here, of giving all this reduction to those men who have incomes ranging from $10,000 to $70,000, changed their position. The proposition of the majority might have varied somewhat from that, but very slightly. I think their plan began at a higher bracket and went up to incomes of $75,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, our program submitted at that time had reference to rates and not to the policy adopted by the minority. Our policy was always to apply certain rates and, as I said then, to allow such rates clear through as to all taxpayers, as has been done in the case of every tax bill since the first one which was passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am talking about the tentative proposition which was submitted by the majority; I am not talking about their second proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I have reference to.

Mr. SIMMONS. The tentative proposition of the majority provided, as I understand, very much as did our proposition; that is to say——

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator in his own time, if I am not right, may correct me. I really am not able to get into a wrangle about this matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I realize that.

Mr. SIMMONS. And I would prefer the Senator would answer me in his own time.

Mr. SMOOT. Our proposition was as to rates; that is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the proposition of the majority was so framed that the taxpayer in the range of lower brackets would get a benefit from the reducttion made in the total amount of the $25,000,000 which the majority said ought to be reduced on the incomes of those falling within those surtax brackets. Subsequently a different proposition was submitted, and it is to that proposition that I file this proposed substitute. Why do the minority through me file this proposed substitute? Because the second proposition of the committee gives only about three-fifths of the reduction to income-tax payers within the brackets dealt with and gives the other two-fifths of the reduction to income-tax payers whose incomes exceeded $75,000.

I think that is a clear case, Mr. President, of the admission of a wrong and of a purpose to remedy that wrong in order to give struggling taxpayers, who have been overburdened by the last bill, relief to the extent of $25,000,000. But when the proposition is put in writting and incorporated in the bill and presented to the Senate, and stands here to-day to be voted upon, the fact is disclosed that, so far from carrying out that purpose, so far from carrying out what was conceded to be justice to these taxpayers, while apparently it is proposed to give them a $25,000,000 reduction the schedules have been so readjusted and juggled, if I may use that term without being offensive, that they get only $15,000,000, in round numbers, instead of $25,000,000, and at the same time the great rich surtax payers are handed over $10,000,000 of the reduction that ought to have gone to them and that was justly due them by reason of the fact that this wrong and injustice had been done them in the last bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. When the Senator speaks of the rich class who get the benefit of this reduction of $10,000,000 he means those who have incomes of $70,000 or more?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Which means that class of taxpayers in this country who have capital assets of a million and a half dollars and over?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. The largest taxpayers in this country pay upon incomes of between five and ten million dollars; but each of them gets his share.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And, if I am correctly informed, that the tables show that these taxpayers, since the war taxes of 1918, have received a reduction of 66 per cent in their taxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Their surtaxes at the peak of the war, Mr. President, were 65 per cent. That was the maximum—65 per cent. We reduced that to 50 per cent. Then we reduced it to 40 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Maximum.

Mr. SIMMONS. Maximum. I am speaking about the maximum. In the last bill we reduced the 40 per cent to 20 per cent; we cut it in two; so that the present maximum tax is less than one-third of what it was at the war peak of taxation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think it represents a tax-bill reduction of about 66 per cent in the case of those who have incomes over $100,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not estimated the exact amount, but I should say it was fully that.

Mr. SMOOT. Not on the $80,000 man.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator was speaking about the maximum, as I was. Everybody with an income over $100,000 under this bill gets the maximum rate, does he not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. And he gets the benefit of that reduction. I am only speaking now about the maximum rate.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know that under his plan all the reduction that taxpayers with incomes over $50,000 will receive is $2,100,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. How is that?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the plan of the Senator the total credit to all of the taxpayers with incomes over $50,000 is $2,100,000. That is all they get out of the $25,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. That means, of course, that the people with incomes between $50,000 and $70,000 would get a good part of the total and the rest of it would go to the other taxpayers.

Mr. SMOOT. Twenty-three million dollars would go to one class and $2,000,000 to the other.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I am advised by the Actuary of the Treasury that under your plan of reduction the taxpayers with incomes above $70,000 will get $9,600,000 reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I am mistaken, then I am mistaken because of the estimate that has been given to me. I have it right here. I will read the statement before I finish, if the Senator will be patient with me.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the statement here.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will read the statement given me by the Actuary of the Treasury in his own handwriting.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina permit a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that on account of physical conditions I can speak only a very short time, and if I submit to interruptions I shall find myself unable to discuss the essential things that I want to discuss. I will thank the Senator, therefore, if he will reply in his own time.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize that, and I am not going to interrupt the Senator in any way.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, the Senator knows that I never object to interruptions; but I have a task before me, and it is about all I can do.

Mr. SMOOT. I told the Senator myself that I did not want to get him excited, as he generally does. I am very glad indeed that the Senator is taking the discussion easily and quietly, and I am not going to ask him any other questions.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Actuary of the Treasury informs me at this minute that the figures I have just given were accurate.

Mr. President, I might state in a general way that the minority plan imposes no surtax on incomes between $10,000 and $12,000. The present law imposes none upon incomes up to $10,000. We extend that, and impose no surtax upon incomes from $10,000 to $12,000. The majority plan retains the tax in the present law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And there is no reduction until the $20,000 bracket is reached.

Mr. SIMMONS. Twenty dollars is the tax in the present law, and the majority proposition retains that tax.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is the surtax.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am talking about the surtax. The Senate understands that.

On a net income of $14,000 the present rate is $40. The minority proposes to make it $20. That is a reduction of one-half.

I might add in a general way that after we reach an income of $70,000 the minority makes no reduction whatsoever. All of its reductions are made between $10,000 and $70,000. The majority plan continues its reduction up to the highest income that is listed for surtax.

Both the majority and the minority schedules of surtaxes impose no surtax on incomes below $10,000.

On incomes between $10,000 and $15,000 the majority make no reduction from the present law, while the minority reduce the present surtax on $15,000 from $60 to $40.

On incomes between $15,000 and $20,000 the majority make no reduction from the present law, while the minority reduce the present surtax on $20,000 $60, both from the present law and from the majority.

On incomes of $30,000 the minority reduce the surtax $210 more than the majority.

On incomes of $35,000 the minority reduce the surtax $280 more than the majority.

Now we come to the $70,000 mark, and the situation is changed. We reduced the surtax only up to that point, and we reduced it up to that point to the total extent of $25,000,000, at least; maybe a little more. I think it is more; but when we reached $70,000 we stopped. When $70,000 was reached, however, the majority continued their reductions; and let me read the reductions that they made in excess of what we had made.

On incomes of $70,000 the majority reduce the surtax $670 more than the minority.

On incomes of $80,000 the majority reduce the surtax $670 more than the minority. That is their total reduction. We made none.

On incomes of $90,000 the majority reduce the surtax $570 more than the minority.

On incomes of $100,000 and upward the majority reduce the surtax $470 more than the minority.

The highest reduction made by either the majority or the minority is that of $670, which is on incomes of from $70,000 to $80,000. The next highest is that on incomes of $90,000, where they reduce the surtax $570. The next is on incomes of $100,000; and then they make a flat reduction of $470 to every individual income-tax payer whose income is above $100,000, without reference to the amount. If it is $10,000,000, the taxpayer gets the same reduction, $470, from his surtax.

Mr. President, in determining the question of equality of individual income taxes it is necessary to consider not only the surtax but the normal tax imposed.

You may impose a normal tax in such a way as to oppress the low taxpayer, just as you may impose a surtax so as to oppress the low taxpayer. You can make a normal tax so as to give the lower taxpayer less advantage than you give to the higher taxpayer. So that in considering the question of the fairness of a tax, whether it be normal or surtax, you have to take those two taxes together, the surtax and the normal tax.

There is a graduated normal tax on the first taxable $8,000 of net income ranging from 1½ per cent to 5 per cent on incomes in excess of this $8,000 in the present law. That is to say, when the taxable income exceeds $8,000 every income-tax payer, however great or small the amount of his income tax, must pay a normal tax of 5 per cent.

On the first $8,000 there is a graduated normal tax, but even those who pay that have to pay the normal tax, and the man with a taxable net income of only a thousand dollars has to pay a normal tax, but to $8,000 it is graduated. When we reach the $8,000 mark the normal tax becomes flat, and the man with an income of over this $8,000 of taxable income has to pay exactly the same percentage upon his income over this $8,000 of taxable income that the man with a million dollars has to pay upon his income.

Mr. President, based upon the idea of the ability of the taxpayer to pay, that, of course, is an indefensible proposition, because the inability of a small taxpayer to pay 5 per cent is not as great as the ability of a large taxpayer to pay 5 per cent. But there seems to be no escape from the idea that every taxpayer, practically, ought to be required to pay a normal tax. So, after various reductions, we have come down to a flat tax of 5 per cent, not a very excessive tax, but a very considerable tax. It is almost equal to the interest upon the amount of the income per year.

If it stopped there, the inequity would not be so palpable, but we must consider, in connection with that normal tax, the fact, and it is the big fact in this proposition, that a man whose income is derived from dividends of corporations pays no normal tax at all. He pays only a surtax if his net income is in excess of $10,000. Where do the big dividends from corporations finally find lodgment in this tax scheme? Is it in the small incomes? Does the man of $10,000 income get much benefit from the exemption of the dividends of corporations from the normal tax? No; usually he does not receive dividends from corporations, or if he does, it is so infinitesimal as to amount to nothing. The great dividends which go into these incomes of individual taxpayers are to be found in that range lying between $70,000 and the peak of incomes listed for taxation.

I have here a table with regard to that which I desire now to read to the Senate. Dividends returned by individuals with net incomes of $70,000 and more amount to $807,000,000. Not a penny of this normal tax of 5 per cent is paid on $807,000,000 of the incomes of taxpayers with incomes in excess of $70,000, because that $807,000,000 is derived from dividends of the big corporations of this country; 17,542 individuals get the benefit of that reduction. What per cent is that $807,000,000 of the total income of these taxpayers with incomes above $70,000? It is 27 per cent. That is, taxpayers with incomes above $70,000 pay not one dime of this normal tax of 5 per cent on 27 per cent of their total net income.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah shakes his head. I am giving figures in the handwriting of the Actuary of the Treasury. They pay no normal tax at all upon dividends received amounting to $807,000,000.

Now, take the total reduction because of dividends, which applies to 4,000,000 people, and it is only 16 per cent. So that the general average of the per cent of dividends in the total amount of income returned by the individual taxpayers of this country is only 16 per cent, but of that part of the taxpayers whose incomes exceed $70,000 it is 27 per cent. I am advised that that statement is absolutely correct.

Mr. President, I say that that situation must be considered. So that these people who have incomes above $50,000 have not only received a reduction since the war of from 65 per cent, their maximum surtax, to 20 per cent, their maximum surtax now, but in their normal tax they receive an exemption of 27 per cent of their total net income by reason of dividends, while the average of all taxpayers has received only 16 per cent.

While I have not the figures worked out as to the taxpayers in the lower brackets, I believe that in the lower brackets they have received a much smaller average than 16 per cent. The taxpayers with these small incomes, I will say up to thirty or forty thousand dollars, even, have very little income derived from dividends. Of course, some of them may have considerable, but some of them have none. It is not until we get into the range of a hundred-thousand-dollar income that the dividends begin to play an important and a controlling part in the normal taxation.

It is commonly known in this country that great financiers, who stand at the head of the column that chronicles the rich of this country, derive the bulk of their incomes from dividends of corporations. They transact their business almost entirely through corporations. Take, for instance, the Standard Oil, and the other oil companies in this country. The men who have made immense fortunes out of those oil companies derive their incomes chiefly from dividends, which are exempt from this normal tax. Take the great steel corporation. The men who control that great organization and have grown enormously rich in recent years—rich beyond the dreams of avarice, men who can hardly count their millions—derive their incomes from dividends of corporations. They have their full share, and we do not think they are entitled to any more. But the administration, through its Secretary of the Treasury, and through the majority members of the Committee on Finance, speaking the voice and command of the Secretary and his assistant, Mr. Mills, instead of giving relief to the people who were done an injustice in the last law, say they will not give them any relief unless we let the big rich in this country, men with incomes of over $70,000, have their part in it, unless we will permit the millionaires to participate to a small extent in it.

Mr. President, I have nothing to say against corporations. I have stood upon this floor and advocated what some call radical reduction in the burdens imposed by the present administration upon corporations. I asked for the graduated income tax upon the smaller corporations, but I asked also for a reduction of 2 per cent in the corporate taxation on all corporations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Instead of the one recommended by the majority.

Mr. SIMMONS. Instead of the one recommended by the majority. I have nothing against corporations. I want justice done them. I thought before and I think now that the best way in the world to relieve the small taxpayers of this country is by reducing the taxes on corporations, especially the big corporations, which, by trust agreement, by combinations, by cooperation, by price fixing, are able to fix their prices, pay these taxes of the Government, and add the taxes to the cost of operation, and pass them on to the general consumers of the country. I think that to reduce their tax is not only just to them, but it is just to the individual consumers of the country as well. I favored it.

I have no prejudice against corporations. I have no prejudice against wealth. God knows I believe that every man in the country has a right to acquire all of this world's goods that his capacity and his opportunity will permit him honestly to acquire. I would not inveigh against any accumulation of riches if it were acquired honestly and legitimately. I respect the man who has the ability to take advantage of his opportunities and by his great talent, foresight, sagacity, and caution accumulate wealth, hundreds of thousands and even millions of dollars. But when it comes to the matter of taxation I am utterly opposed to any scheme of taxation that will permit those men to escape their just burdens in the payment of their just part of the expenses of the Government.

Tell me, if you will, where the great rich and the corporations pay any tax except through the income tax and the corporation tax? What other taxes do they pay? That is all. The income tax is our chief means of reaching them and our only source outside of the corporation tax. I want them to pay their just share. If they were taxed too high for war purposes, when that emergency is past let us cut those taxes down. That we have done. With the consent of the minority that has been done. We said these taxes were made very onerous during the war because an emergency and a necessity existed. I told one great taxpayer who came to see me with reference to the matter of overtaxing his income while the war was raging, "My dear sir, we have taxed you high." He said, "You have taken most of my income." I said, "We will take it all and we will go into your principal if it is necessary for this Government to win the war in the interest of peace and in the interest of civilization." But the war is over. They are entitled to the same treatment in reduction of their taxes that the humblest man in the country is entitled to, but no more.

When they come here and demand that we give them greater relief in the reduction of taxation than we do the small man, I for one will not be silent, but I will speak as loudly as I am able to speak, whether ill or well, in denunciation of such a suggestion. I say that the smaller taxpayers were not justly treated. When the 1926 act was under discussion I had then a scheme by which taxpayers having incomes of less than $70,000 would have been given $43,000,000 reduction more than was actually given them. We actually gave them only half of that for which the minority contended. The minority contended for $44,000,000, and we gave them only about $23,000,000. The sum of $23,000,000 was taken off to meet a situation which existed in the committee under the hurried conditions under which we were operating, the administration driving us under whip and spur to get through with tax legislation before the 15th of March, 1926, threatening dire disaster and calamity to the Treasury unless we did so. We yielded $23,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury knew and the minority knew this was the reason for so doing.

This year the Secretary of the Treasury and the minority unite in agreeing that they ought to be relieved to the extent of $25,000,000. What I stand here and oppose to-day is this second attempt to allow the men with incomes in excess of $70,000, and running up to $1,000,000, $5,000,000, and $10,000,000 to grab two-fifths of that reduction and appropriate it to themselves. Nobody ever contended that they did not get their full share in the last bill. I think they were only asking 20 per cent. I do not think they asked a reduction below 20 per cent maximum. I will ask my brethren on the committee if they remember any request for less than that?

Mr. GEORGE. There was none.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I recall none.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not in favor of giving them quite that much, but I will say here now what I have not said before, that I consented in the meeting of our minority members of the committee, to reduce them 20 per cent upon the condition that they would give the smaller incomes in the lower brackets a $44,000,000 reduction. I filed a statement here, representing the minority, saying that that 20 per cent was agreed to upon that condition. But in the committee, as I said, we were forced to give up nearly half of that reduction and we are now asking that they have it, and have it all and not only a part.

Here is a statement which I said I would read in confirmation of the statement I made that the larger taxpayers would get $9,600,000 of the $25,000,000 which it has been agreed to allow. I read it. It is in the handwriting of the Actuary of the Treasury:

> The majority reduction of surtaxes on individuals reduces the taxes on individuals with net incomes of over $70,000, $9,600,000, and $15,600,000 of net incomes not in excess of $70,000. It provides that every taxpayer with a net income in excess of $100,000 be relieved of $470. The minority proposes to reduce the tax so as to confine it to the lower brackets.

Some question has been made about an inequity in the reductions allowed to incomes ranging between $70,000 and $100,000, particularly $80,000 and $90,000, and along there. Under our scheme they do not get any reduction this time. It is contended that they did not get enough last time. They did not get the same per cent last time, and they did not get the same per cent in 1924, but in the original tax law, from which we make our reductions and upon which our reductions are all based, they got a very decided advantage. The advantage which they then got they are not entitled to bring forward now. That must be counted against them in any reduction now.

In discussing the matter a few days ago in the Senate I said that they were given a lower rate than they were entitled to. That was disputed. I want to read a statement:

> Under the temporary act of 1917 the taxpayer with net income of $80,000 had a decided advantage over the net income down to $60,000 The income-tax brackets of that act started at $20,000 and jumped $20,000.

Then follows a technical statement, which I will not undertake to read, showing that fact. In the 1917 act they were not taxed in proportion to the taxes imposed upon the other incomes. In the adjustment of the spread between the brackets this little spread between $70,000 and $100,000 got a great advantage. My impression is now that we had a jump from $80,000 to $100,000. They got an advantage by reason of that tremendous spread. We have discussed that many times here in the Senate. We have shown that we can raise or reduce taxes by simply increasing the spread or reducing the spread. That is the process by which both sides of the Chamber, when they go to write a surtax amendment, either increase or reduce rates. It is done by the spread.

In the original act, by reason of this tremendous spread, this class of taxpayers got a decided advantage in the rate of tax imposed upon them over the balance of the taxpayers, and that fact should be taken into consideration now in reducing taxes, as it has been taken into consideration more or less, but not fully, in other tax bills which we have considered. All of the 1917 brackets tend to make the tax rate on incomes of $80,000 comparatively low. A comparison of the 1926 act with the 1917 act is very misleading. That is the comparison which the majority make and it is very misleading. The trouble with such comparisons of the total tax is that the 1917 normal tax rate was only 4 per cent, while that in 1926 is, after the first $8,000 taxable income, 5 per cent. If there is any inequality, it is in the normal tax rate, and it can be cured by reducing the 5 per cent normal tax rate to 3½ or 4 per cent. That is what I said a little while ago. We have to take these things into consideration. We have never reduced that normal tax. By reason of the fact that we have never reduced it, this class of taxpayers, which they say now are getting such a little reduction, have during all the years carried this great advantage which they got in the original rates fixed in the 1917 act.

The document which I have just read in part is a statement prepared by me, the figures of which have been verified by the representative of the Treasury Department, Mr. McCoy. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD entire at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> The 1917 revenue act rates were a makeshift scheme hurriedly enacted to meet the great war emergency, fully intended to be perfected by the 1918 act. It added to the surtax zones of the 1916 act new additional rates, and to this superimposed a further tax never applied to individuals before nor after 1917—the excess-profits tax. This surtax scheme began at a net income of $5,000 and with jumps of $2,500 for each 1 per cent of increase in rate, until a rate of 5 per cent was reached on net income in excess of $15,000 and not in excess of $20,000. The next zone covers income of $20,000, from $20,000 to $40,000, at the single rate of 8 per cent, a rate very evidently too heavy for the lower part of this $20,000 zone and too light for the upper part. The 1918 act wisely broke this zone into 10 zones of $2,000 each, with 10 several and increasing rates of tax. The next rate of tax in the 1917 act again applied to a zone of $20,000, a rate jumped from 8 per cent to 12 per cent. The 1918 act again broke this $20,000 zone into 10 zones of $2,000 each, each with its different rate of tax. The 1917 act again made its next zone $20,000, running from $60,000 to $80,000, with the single rate of 17 per cent, a jump from 12 per cent. The 1918 act again broke this zone into 10 smaller zones, each with its separate rate of tax. Again the 1917 plan used a zone of $20,000, increasing the rate for the entire zone from 17 per cent to 22 per cent. The 1918 act again broke this zone into 10 smaller zones, each with its own rate of tax.
> The minority is criticized for making one jump of 4 per cent in its rates, while the 1917 act made many jumps of 4 per cent, several of 5 per cent, and several of 6 per cent, yet they want us to change our rates on account of a comparison of the 1926 rates with the 1917 rates. The above explanation of the 1917 rates shows them so unfair and unreasonable that it is surprising that any person would wish to recall them. However, in the comparison so strongly emphasized and charted, the normal tax must be included and the excess-profits tax eliminated in order to arrive at the desired base of an argument. The excess-profits tax has been eliminated. If the majority wish to remedy the condition shown by their charts, why not change the normal tax rate. The 1917 normal rate was 4 per cent, while the normal tax on taxable income in excess of the first $8,000 of such income is 5 per cent. Of course, taxpayers with the highest incomes care much more for the surtax rates than they do for the normal rates, as their income is subject to the surtax rates, but only part of this income is subject to the normal tax rates.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am tempted to enter into other lines of discussion in this connection, but necessity compels me to desist. I shall not at present make any further observations with respect to the question.

ALLOTMENTS ON SHOSHONE OR WIND RIVER RESERVATION, WYO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3365) to authorize allotments to unallotted Indians on the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, Wyo., which was, on page 2, line 3, to strike out the word "to" and insert "in common for the benefit of."

Mr. KENDRICK. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION WEDNESDAY FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the order which I send to the desk. I will state that I have spoken to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and several Senators on the other side, and it is agreeable to them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed unanimous-consent order will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered (by unanimous consent), That on Wednesday, May 16, 1928, at not later than 6 o'clock p. m., the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., and that at the evening session, which shall not continue later than 11 o'clock, the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand that order has the approval of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who represents the minority leader, and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]?

Mr. CURTIS. It has his approval.

Mr. DILL. If, after unobjected bills shall have been called, there is any time remaining——

Mr. CURTIS. I have not asked for the consideration of anything except unobjected bills, thinking that I would later ask for another evening session for the consideration of objected bills.

Mr. DILL. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to take up the conference report on the naval appropriation, being House bill 12286.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will that result in any discussion?

Mr. HALE. I do not think so.

Mr. SMOOT. If it shall, I would not like to give consent for the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. HALE. If consideration of the conference report leads to debate, I shall withdraw it, but I do not think it will do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, of course, I lose the floor by yielding in that fashion, but I will submit myself to the good graces of the Chair.

Mr. HALE. I move to take up the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not wish the Senator to move to take it up. Let him ask unanimous consent that it be taken up.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the conference report may be taken up, and I move its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the conference report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. CYRUS LOCHER BEFORE BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LOCHER] before the Triennial National Convention of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen at Cleveland, Ohio, on Wednesday, May 9, 1928.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator LOCHER. More than 40 years ago eight men organized the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen in the caboose of a freight train. The purpose of the organization was and is to unite the railroad trainmen to protect and defend their rights as employees; to better cooperate with employers, and to better the working conditions of the railroad men, and to give them an opportunity to engage in the pursuit of happiness with some chance of attaining it.

The organization headquarters have been in this great city for nearly 30 years, and the membership has grown to approximately 200,000. Men do not organize without a reason, and organizations do not continue and grow without accomplishment. Your success has been due to high-minded, wise, and aggressive leadership on the part of your officers, and the faithful and loyal cooperation of the members.

I shall not attempt to estimate the services your organization has rendered to your membership, to your employers, to labor and the public in general, and to the country in time of peace and war; that the contribution has been large is recognized everywhere.

The labor situation as we find it to-day, and as it has existed for some time, is such that it calls for close study of the facts of unemployment and the closest diagnosis of the history of unemployment.

The Secretary of Labor reports that there are 1,874,050 people in voluntary idleness in this country. It is rather difficult to accept the statement that so many citizens are voluntarily unemployed. Other estimates of unemployment run as high as 7,000,000 men and women, all of whom, it is fair to surmise, are ready, willing, and able to work, but who have not been able to find employment.

Apparently there is no place where we can obtain exact unemployment data. The Department of Labor, through contact offices operating in metropolitan areas throughout the United States, gathers information on employment, but it is my understanding that statistics on unemployment are not furnished in specific form. Under this system, therefore, unemployment data can be procured only by the deduction method. I seem to be supported in this assertion by the Commissioner of Labor Statistics, who, in his recent report, points out that he is not supplying any unemployment information but is merely giving the shrinkage of the pay-rolls between 1925 and 1928. By analyzing the annual pay-roll population of the years affected, he arrives, by calculation, at the unemployed figure of 1,874,050, which his chief, the Secretary of Labor, publishes as an official estimate.

This method of determining the number of unemployed obviously omits:

First. The growth of population (2,000,000 boys and girls annually reach the working age);

Second. Immigration (252,000 unnaturalized citizens from other lands were added to our population in 1927 alone);

Third. Drift from the farm to the city (the Secretary of Agriculture reports that farms contributed 3,000,000 persons to the city from 1920 to 1927); and Fourth. The number of unemployed in 1925.

We have two classes of idle men among the unemployed; that is, those whose work has been suspended by reason of business depression and those who have been released from industry because their work is being done by machinery.

Thoughtful men universally agree that unemployment is not a political problem but an economic condition. They are agreed that the unemployment problem can not be satisfactorily solved by invoking political panaceas or other cure-alls. Treatment of the symptoms of the unemployment malady is futile so long as the causes are not diagnosed. After the fundamental facts, which embrace the human as well as the commercial aspects of the problem, are known, then an electric treatment, which calls into play a selection of that which is best in sound economics may be prescribed with reasonable assurance of remedy.

The Government does not owe its citizens a living, but society does owe all an opportunity to earn a living.

Several bills are now pending in the National Congress that seek to eliminate the so-called business cycle, and to prevent rapid inflation and deflation; and to free workers of the anxiety of unemployment.

It is proposed to extend the present service of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. It is the opinion of students of the unemployment problem that reliable statistics would enlighten us on employment and unemployment. Accurate employment information is not available at present. Accurate information is requisite to the solution of every problem. Both business men and labor are anxious to have the information, and would gladly cooperate in the collection.

Legislation is pending to create and extend a system of employment offices on a nation-wide scale. Employment offices do not create jobs, but they do, however, reduce waiting time between jobs and eliminate the waste of job hunting.

Several bills are being considered by the Congress providing for long-range planning of public works, a principle long since recognized but so far never put into operation. This does not mean that in times of depression the Government should overreach its building program. It does not mean the profligate spending of money. It means the intelligent control of the spending that we do, so that the time and speed of public work will vary with conditions of the labor market. This legislation attempts to keep the industrial machine from revolving too rapidly at one time and too slowly at another. The Federal Government constitutes the greatest single spending agency in the country. For this reason, since Government is not interested in profits, the Government's spending power should be used as the stabilizer of industrial activity.

There have been 15 periods of unemployment during the past 100 years in this country. We are in one of these periods of unemployment now.

There is pending in the United States Senate a resolution that provides for an exhaustive investigation by a committee of the Senate of the unemployment situation during the summer months. This resolution rests on the basic assumption that unemployment is an economic condition.

Public and semipublic agencies, insurance companies, and private business organizations have expressed a desire to cooperate. The resolution has been referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, of which I am a member, and a subcommittee has been appointed to draw up amendments to enlarge the scope of the investigation.

The resolution recognizes the magnitude of the problem and its importance to the country. It provides, among other things, for the exhaustive investigation of facts and the collection of accurate information to determine, if possible:

1. To what extent, if any, does mass production cause unemployment? Mass production is here to stay, but if it is a contributing cause to unemployment, new policies to take care of the unemployed must be provided;

2. To what extent, if any, do consolidations and mergers of industry cause unemployment? and

3. To what extent, if any, does speculation in industry cause unemployment?

It appears to me that the Federal Government, through its legislative and executive departments, has an exceptional opportunity here to do something entirely nonpolitical and entirely sound economically toward procuring the information upon which labor and industry may proceed toward correcting the existing unemployment situation. If "new occasions teach new duties," all those affected by the economic transition should consecrate their best thought and service toward the upbuilding of a revised and improved social and industrial order. To that end I willingly pledge my full cooperation. I urge upon this intelligent gathering the fullest coordination of effort and solicit your reciprocal cooperation that together we may move toward the goal of contentment, which only can come when our hands and hearts are happily employed and those dependent upon our labor are assured the necessities and comforts of life, according to the recognized standard of American living.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD two editorials, one from the New York Sun and the other from the Washington Post, on the subject of Muscle Shoals for fertilizer purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The editorials are as follows:

[From New York Sun, May 11, 1928]

REVOLUTIONARY AND SOCIALISTIC

The National Fertilizer Association has a natural and selfish interest in opposing the House substitute for the Norris resolution in regard to Muscle Shoals, because if that substitute should be enacted into law, it would mean the ultimate ruin of the private fertilizer business in the United States and the creation of a virtual governmental monopoly. It so happens, however, that in this matter the private interest of fertilizer manufacturers and the general public interest move together in complete accord. For this reason, if for no other, the public has reason to be thankful to the National Fertilizer Association for the skillful way in which it marshaled an attack upon this foolish and vicious legislation.

If it wishes to do so there can be no doubt that the Government is able to go into the fertilizer business. Provided there were sufficient popular support, it could also manage to go into the business of producing coal, or making cement, of quarrying stone, of producing and marketing any of a thousand other things. But it could not conduct any of these forms of business without making a mess of them, as it made a mess of the railroad business when it went into that and as it has made a mess of the shipping business ever since it has been engaged in that.

The chief clamor for this Muscle Shoals scheme comes from regions and interests which would be directly benefited by the operation of great manufacturing plants and from demagogic representatives of farming constituencies who are trying to persuade the farmer he can thus get fertilizers at little or no expense, save expense to the Federal Government. But if Congress is to yield to this clamor and establish the revolutionary precedent now proposed, how is it hereafter to resist similar clamor from all the other special interests which will demand Federal occupation of private business fields?

The proposed measure would create a "Muscle Shoals corporation of the United States" and set it up in business for not less than 10 years; it would turn over to this corporation free of charge properties which have already cost the taxpayers $140,000,000; it would furnish the corporation with $10,000,000 in addition for operating capital, free of interest for five years. It would require the corporation to enter all phases of business incidental to manufacturing and distributing nitrogen and complete fertilizers.

In return for these favors the corporation would be required to sell its products for cash f. o. b. Muscle Shoals, the sales to be made to farmers individually and in groups, to States and State agencies for resale to farmers, and would be authorized to dispose of any surplus to private manufacturers. All sales of fertilizer would have to be at cost of production, but any income from the sale of surplus power produced by the plant would be deducted from that cost. For purpose of experimentation, 5 per cent of the output or even more may be distributed free.

There are various other incidental authorizations, but the most astonishing and indefensible provision of the whole bill is one which would subject to imprisonment for 15 years or fine of $25,000 any person who should enter into any agreement of any kind "with intent to defeat the purposes of the corporation." In other words, it is proposed not only to enable the Government to produce fertilizers at a cost which will be ruinous to private competitors but to paralyze private competition still further by making it a penal offense to push private competition to any stage where it might be construed as an attempt to defeat the Federal monopoly in the commodity.

No form of monopoly more odious than this has ever been proposed in the United States; none more odious now exists in Soviet Russia. American business of all kinds has a right to take alarm at this socialistic scheme, for if it succeeds all the foundations upon which private enterprise now rests will have become shaky and uncertain. If the United States can deliberately create a monopoly and put American fertilizer manufacturers out of business, it can deliberately create any similar monopoly by which it may be desired to put any other private American industry out of business.

[From Washington Post, May 14, 1928]

THE MUSCLE SHOALS BILL

The House of Representatives next Wednesday will dispose of the Muscle Shoals bill in an hour's debate. The Morin-Norris proposal as now presented to the House is one of the most astounding pieces of legislation ever presented for the serious consideration of Congress. It provides for the creation of a Government business corporation to take charge of the $150,000,000 property at Muscle Shoals, gives it $10,000,000 of the people's money as working capital, and directs it to manufacture fertilizer and sell it at cost to American farmers. For five years no interest is to be earned even upon the $10,000,000, and no interest is ever to be earned on the $150,000,000 already sunk in Muscle Shoals. The Government business corporation is authorized to expend $40,000,000 additional for a new reservoir, etc., making a total of $200,000,000 which is to be handled for the benefit of some of the people at the expense of the remainder of the people.

As if this were not enough, the Government business concern is directed to give away without cost a portion of the fertilizer, and the proceeds of surplus power sold are to be used in reducing the cost of fertilizer. No one who is not a consumer of fertilizer is to have any benefit from the Muscle Shoals plant, built and paid for by all the people. The Treasury is not even to have the benefit of taxes upon the property or the business. If losses should occur, the American people, and not the beneficiaries of the Government fertilizer trust, are to pay the deficit.

The bill creates many offices, including a board of directors of five members at $50 a day and expenses, three executive officers at a total salary of $50,000 a year, and scores of superintendents, agents, and other employees, all to be paid out of the United States Treasury.

The bill paves the way for Federal interference with the States in the regulation of rates charged for power from Muscle Shoals.

In view of the fact that the Senate has already approved of the Norris communist resolution, which proposes to put the Government into the fertilizer manufacturing business, the action of the House upon the composite bill becomes doubly important.

Unless the House kills this measure, as it should do, President Coolidge will probably have before him the alternative of vetoing the bill or surrendering the strong objections he has expressed against putting the Government in business. Only a few days ago, on April 16, in addressing the Daughters of the American Revolution, President Coolidge said:

"There is one field, however, which belongs to the people, upon which they have uniformly insisted that the Federal Government should not trespass. That is the domain of private business. Society requires certain public activities, like highways and drainage, which are used in common and can best be provided by the Government. But in general the country is best served through the competition of private enterprise. If the people are to remain politically free, they must be economically free. Their only hope in that direction is for them to keep their own business in their own hands.

"Our theory of government rests on a higher level than communism. We want the people to be the owners of their property in their own right. * * * The fundamental characteristics of humanity are not going to be changed by substituting Government action for private enterprise. * * * If it is desirable to keep the Government unencumbered and clean, with an eye single to public service, we shall leave the conduct of our private business with the individual, where it belongs, and not undertake to unload it on the Government."

Thus it is evident that if Congress should attempt to unload the fertilizer and power business upon the Government it will meet with the veto of the President. The House should do its share in keeping the Government out of private business by killing the Morin-Norris bill.

DESIGNATION OF CHILD HEALTH DAY

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a few weeks ago the Senate passed a joint resolution designating May 1 as Child Health Day. In the House on last Saturday, through some misunderstanding, instead of passing the Senate joint resolution, a House joint resolution of the same tenor was passed. It has been messaged over to the Senate. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution, being House Joint Resolution 184.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 184) designating May 1 as Child Health Day, which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to issue annually a proclamation setting apart May 1 of each year as Child Health Day, and inviting all agencies and organizations interested in child welfare to unite upon that day in the observance of such exercises as will awaken the people of the Nation to the fundamental necessity of a year-round program for the protection and development of the health of the Nation's children.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DETROIT RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Commerce Committee has just reported Senate bill 4405, a bridge bill in the usual form, but the item of time is very important. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4405) authorizing the Detroit River Canadian Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Detroit River at or near Stony Island, Wayne County, State of Michigan, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate international commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Detroit River Canadian Bridge Co., its successors and assigns be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Detroit River, so far as the United States has jurisdiction over the waters of such river, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Stony Island, Wayne County, State of Michigan, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act, and subject to the approval of the proper authorities in the Dominion of Canada.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the Detroit River Canadian Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property in the State of Michigan needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State of Michigan, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Detroit River Canadian Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge in accordance with any laws of the State of Michigan applicable thereto, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the Detroit River Canadian Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I desire to speak for a very few minutes on the matter of the surtaxes and the amendments proposed by the Finance Committee and by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

I doubt whether the Senate realizes how far we have gone, in the last three tax bills, toward the relief of those taxpayers in the lowest surtax brackets. We have gone much further in their relief than has Great Britain in the relief of similar classes of taxpayers in her country.

Perhaps some of the Senators have not seen the charts that are on the wall. The large chart in the back of the Chamber shows the aggregate tax paid by taxpayers of each income group. By that I mean that the surtax and the normal tax are combined; because, after all, that is what the taxpayer is concerned with. It is the size of the quarterly check that he sends to the collector of internal revenue; and it is of no concern to him whether you call it surtax or normal tax. All he cares about is whether his check is large or small.

Take the lowest class that pays any surtax, the group with incomes of $10,000: Under the war-time tax law of 1918, which became a law in February, 1919, such a person paid about 8⅓ per cent of his total income to the United States in income taxes. We have cut that down by subsequent enactments until at the present time a man with an income of $10,000 pays in normal and surtax exactly 1 per cent of his income. We have cut him down from 8⅓ per cent to 1 per cent. He actually pays less to-day than he did under the pre-war tax law of 1916.

Test it in another way, still considering the man of the $10,000 income:

Great Britain's tax rate against a person with an income of £2,000 is about thirteen times as high as is our tax rate. So much further have we gone than has Great Britain in the way of relief to persons of incomes in the neighborhood of $10,000 that our tax rate against that class of taxpayers is only one-third of what hers is; while, on the other hand, so much less regard have we paid to persons of larger income that when we get up to the person of $60,000 income our tax is approximately one-third of what Great Britain levies against the corresponding income in her country. We treat the $10,000 man thirteen times as well as she does; we treat the $60,000 man only two and three-quarters times as well as she does; and that goes on up until at $300,000 of income we tax our taxpayers one-half the rate that she taxes hers.

The contrast between the philosophy of taxation obtaining there and that obtaining in the United States, it seems to me, is very vividly shown by that chart.

When we get up to the incomes around $60,000 in this country, we find that we are actually taxing them more on the same income than we were under the war tax law of 1917. That is graphically shown by the large chart in the back of the Senate Chamber here, where the red line which shows the rates of the 1917 bill actually overlaps the black line, which shows the rates of percentage under the present law in the United States. It is shown perhaps more vividly on the smaller charts here to the right of the Chamber, where it appears that we are actually charging the man of $80,000 income 2 per cent more than we were charging the man with the same income under the war-time legislation of 1917. And while the $80,000 man is paying 2 per cent more than he was under the war-time legislation, see what we have done for the other fellows.

The man of $10,000 income has had a reduction of 72 per cent under those war-time rates; the man of $5,000 income has had a reduction of 78 per cent; the very rich person, the man with a million dollars income each year, has actually been reduced 49 per cent under that war-time rate, while the $80,000 man, with the maximum earned income under the statute, is, nevertheless, in spite of the earned-income credit, paying 2 per cent more than he was paying at that time.

It seems to me that these charts indicate most vividly where there is the need of tax reduction, if we are to preserve any semblance of justice among the different classes of our taxpayers.

The chart to which I have just called attention might perhaps be criticized because, as I described it, it presupposes that the law of 1917 was a just law in its application to the different classes. Maybe it was not. Maybe it does not furnish an entirely satisfactory standard by which to test the justice of the present law; but let us take any of the others.

Take the earliest act we had, the act of 1913, the one passed just after the income-tax amendment became a law, the one that put it into effect: At the present time, although we have a war to pay for, the man with an income of $5,000 has been increased only 70 per cent over the first law. The man with an income of $10,000 has been increased 68 per cent. The man with the $1,000,000 income, at the other extreme, has been increased only 301 per cent; but the poor devil—the relatively poor devil—who is earning an income of $80,000, has been increased 557 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. Did the Senator say "the poor devil"? [Laughter.]

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. These things are relative. I used the word "poor" as meaning the victim of injustice, rather than as referring to the man who lives in apprehension of the wolf at the door.

Mr. BORAH. He excited the envy of some of us.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Perhaps I, too, envy him; but that is not important.

If we contrast the present-day rates with the rates of the 1918 act—I never understood why it was called that, because it was passed in 1919, after the armistice—which carried the highest rates of income taxation we ever adopted, the man with the $5,000 income finds his tax reduced 91 per cent from those highest war-time rates; the $10,000 class, in which even the Senator from Idaho might join with me in taking an interest, has had a reduction of 88 per cent; while the $50,000 man has had only 56 per cent reduction and the $80,000 man only 53 per cent reduction.

I think the charts show vividly that the one group of taxpayers whom we have given the least relief is the group between $30,000 and $100,000. Perhaps there is something about that class that warrants us in singling it out for especially severe treatment. It may be that it is justice to reduce the million-dollar-a-year man 49 per cent, while at the same time we increase the $80,000 man 2 per cent; but, if that is justice, I never have been able to learn why.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Gladly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course, that situation does not exist now. The injustice the Senator has pointed out did exist in 1926.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It exists at this minute.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. A comparison between the tax laws of 1917 and 1926, I believe, will show as great an injustice as the Senator has pointed out; but a comparison between the 1918 tax law and the 1926 tax law shows no such injustice.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it does, Mr. President.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon! Contrast it with 1918. We have reduced the tax of the man with $1,000,000 a year 66 per cent. He pays just one-third of what he paid then. We have reduced the $80,000 man 53 per cent only.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand that; but the Senator has said, and I agree with him, that the class of surtax payers whose incomes were around $60,000 actually had their taxes increased 2 per cent in the tax bill of 1926 as compared with that of 1917.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is right—$80,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Sixty to eighty thousand dollars; but the fact is that when we compare the 1926 law with the 1918 tax law, the same class of taxpayers had a reduction of 53 to 54 per cent.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Precisely; and that is the least reduction that we have given to anybody when compared with the tax rates of 1918.

Now, let me follow that with one more suggestion.

I doubt whether it is realized by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], but the actual effect of his amendment applied to the man of maximum earning power—$20,000 earning power—will be to make a further increase in the taxes of the $80,000 class, which has had the least consideration up to the present time. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina would have the effect of diminishing the earned-income credit of anybody whose income is over $70,000, and consequently, by diminishing the credit, would increase the actual amount to be paid. So, if the Senate adopts the amendment now pending, offered by the Senator from North Carolina as a substitute for what the Finance Committee did, we will have to say to the business executive who has an income of $80,000 a year that we have actually increased his tax by the tax reduction bill of 1928.

One thing more, I think, deserves to be considered.

I join with my fellow Senators in agreeing that it is an axiom in taxation that taxes must be imposed where they can be easiest paid. We are all agreed on that; and that is why there never has been any substantial contest about the liberal exemptions that we make at the bottom of the scale. That has been true ever since Adam Smith and a long time before he wrote his book. We are all agreed on that.

It is not a sound policy for us to select out a small group of earners, of such men as the presidents and managers of our successful industries, of such men as the leading physicians, the leading architects, the builders of America; it is not a sound idea in taxation to select out a group like that for especially hostile action in an income tax law. I wonder how many of the Senators have had a chance to study the chart which has been placed on the wall in the corner of the Chamber? It shows in black the amount of tax actually paid by those taxpayers whose incomes are less than $50,000, and the Senator will observe that that class of taxpayers paid the most in the year 1920, and that in each of our tax revision bills since then the amount paid by that class has diminished until at the present time it is approximately one-third of the amount of taxes exacted from them in 1920.

While we have gone on relieving that class, we have actually increased the amount paid by taxpayers whose incomes are over $50,000, so that at the present time our taxpayers who earn over $50,000 are paying approximately between two-thirds and three-fourths of the aggregate of the personal income taxes.

That would not be so bad if there were a lot of them, but when you look at the tiny line at the bottom you discover that out of 4,076,000 income-tax payers last year there were only 30,000 persons whose taxable incomes exceeded $50,000. That is less than three-fourths of 1 per cent of the whole group of income-tax payers; and yet we took that little group of three-fourths of 1 per cent, represented by a line so tiny that it is almost impossible to show it on the chart, and we exacted from them more than two-thirds of the money that went to make up the seven hundred-odd million dollars of our income taxes.

In effect, what we have done has been to take that little group of 30,000 people, which includes all the successful business executies, the successful doctors, architects, and professional men of all sorts, and we have put them to work for the rest of us, to make them pay for our Government. To a certain extent it is all right to do that, but to the extent to which we have gone we have put a penalty on hard work.

We are all very solicitous about the man who has an invested income of the same size. It is no trouble really for him to get out of that group. We have given him allowances for depreciation of his property. If he has a mine or a gas well or an oil well, that has a limited life, we allow him what we call depletion, in order that he may deduct from his apparent income what we say is really a return of his capital. But to the architect, whole life is similarly limited, we allow no depletion allowance. To the professional man, the lines in whose face grow deeper every year, we allow nothing for depreciation. That is the group I am pleading for.

Such a person has no opportunity to make the deductions that can be made by one who has an invested income. There is no way of being a tax-free doctor. You can not put your money into tax-free professional activities. This class of which I am speaking now has to pay to the last cent, because there are no such business deductions as are permitted to the taxpayer whose income is the yield from any kind of invested capital. That being so, it seems to me that the injustice of these comparisons is doubly emphasized. It seems to me that it is only right that for once the Senate should leave off giving relief to taxpayers who no longer feel the burden and should give some relief to those to whom the quarterly tax day comes as a calamity.

Take the case which I once before cited to the Senate, of the architect of that gorgeous building in New York, the Woolworth Building, one of the greatest pieces of architecture on our continent. The fee for designing that building was paid to Mr. Ledyard, the architect, and came practically all in one lump, in one year; and the United States Government, which had done nothing to help him in the building of that structure, took two-thirds of his fee for that glorious work. There was no possible deduction he could make. He had earned that fee over a long series of years, but he could not spread it out over a series of years, as the installment dealer in pianos can do. He was an installment dealer in the same sense; that is, in the sense that his work extended over a long period, but the United States gave him no relief. It is that class of taxpayer we ought to think about for once, because it is that class that really is building up America.

Let me, in conclusion, show just what these two amendments would do. The Finance Committee amendment makes a relatively small cut. It is indicated by the broken green line which runs just under the 1926 line on this largest chart. It will be seen that in no case does it make a reduction of so much as 1 per cent of the taxpayer's income. In no case is the reduction as much as that. On the other hand, the greatest relief is given to this class with incomes between $30,000 and $80,000, which has had the least relief in the past acts.

The minority amendment, presented by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], undertakes to give relief to the lower half of that group, but to stop it shortly at $70,000, and to provide no reduction for anybody earning more than $70,000. I have tried to show how, by the operation of the earned-income credit, it will actually have the effect, in the last result, of increasing the tax which is paid by anyone with an income of over $70,000, who is earning, in salary or professionally, as much as $20,000 a year.

To state it in another way, if a taxpayer has an income of $10,000 or more, earned income, the effect of the Simmons amendment will be to raise his taxes, if his aggregate income is $70,000 or greater. I am sure that that is not what the Senator from North Carolina and his associates intended by the amendment. I am sure that it is not what the Senate or the Congress means to do, and yet in the last analysis that is the effect of the amendment on which we are now about to vote.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not think there is very much difference between the Senater from Pennsylvania and myself in relation to what these tables may mean. A comparison of the tax law of 1926 with the tax law of 1917 shows that certain surtax payers actually were obliged to pay a higher tax when comparison of the law of 1917 is made with that of 1926. However, that is not a fair comparison. There was a great deal of difference between the law of 1917 and the law of 1918. There was a difference in the normal tax. Also in levying surtaxes, there were only four brackets employed in the law of 1917, in the spread of incomes between $20,000 and $100,000, while in the law of 1918 there were 40 brackets, graduating the surtax between $20,000 and $100,000. That is one of the reasons for this apparent injustice that has been urged by the Senator from Pennsylvania. You can change the tax very substantially for certain classes of taxpayers by very slight changes in the brackets. The brackets used in 1917 were so few that when you compare the tax imposed on a taxpayer who had an income of $60,000 in 1917, with a tax levied under the 1926 act, he will be shown to have actually paid 1 or 2 per cent higher tax. But the peak of all taxes, and the largest taxes levied upon every class, was in 1918, and the only fair comparison to make, it seems to me, is to compare the amount of tax paid in 1918 and the amount paid by the same class of taxpayers in 1926, showing how much lower the actual tax was.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. REED of Pennsylvania addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he has made a mistake in regard to the number of brackets in the law of 1917. That law had 22 brackets. The 1916 act had 4 brackets. I will hand the act to the Senator if he wants to see it. There are 22 brackets in the law of 1917.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Actuary from the Treasury Department, of whom I have just made inquiry, informs me that there was a difference between the 4 brackets of the 1917 law and the 40 brackets of the 1918 law. The Senator states that there were four brackets in the 1916 law. Is it true that there were 40 in the 1918 law?

Mr. SMOOT. There were 22 in the 1917 act. That is when we began to raise the rates.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think, perhaps, the Senator did not hear me clearly. What I stated was that, compared with any previous income tax law from 1913 down to 1924, a man with an income of $80,000 has received less relief in this measure than any other group of taxpayers, no matter with what you compare him.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator will agree that the fair comparison to make now in determining what benefits have come to the taxpayers of this country is a comparison of the tax law of to-day with the tax law of 1918, which carries the highest taxes ever levied by this Government.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am willing to accept that statement, and if we do make that comparison, we find this group of which I have been speaking has received materially less relief than the other classes above or below it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is true, but if we use the law of 1918 in the comparison with the law of 1926, we change from a minus to a plus figure in the reduction of taxes, and we find the relief given very substantial.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Very good; I am willing to take the Senator's own standard, and the results are shown at the top of the chart on the wall.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How much less, I ask, does the individual taxpayer pay to-day compared with his tax bill of 1918 if his income is $5,000? I have the figures here.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Ninety-one per cent less.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly, and with an income of $10,000 he gets a tax reduction of 88 per cent.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is right.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. With an income of $30,000, he gets a reduction of 64 per cent. With an income of $50,000, he gets a reduction of 56 per cent. With an income of $80,000, he gets a reduction of 53 per cent. With an income of $100,000, he gets a reduction of 54 per cent. With an income of $1,000,000, he gets a reduction of 66 per cent. So that all taxpayers have had reductions of over 50 per cent in their tax bill when we compare the law of 1926 with the law of 1918. Is there any dispute about that fact?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There is no dispute about that. Some of them have had their taxes cut to one-tenth of what they were, and others have had them cut to one-half. I can see the difference between the two fractions, even if a Democrat can not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Republicans are capable of drawing some very fine distinctions to serve their ends. A Senator at my side suggests that they see some things that do not really exist.

Mr. President, there is $25,000,000 to be distributed in the way of reduced taxes to the surtax taxpayers, and we ought to ask ourselves what class of surtax taxpayers ought to get the benefit of that reduction, applying the principle applied in 1918 of ability to pay. The majority recommendation is to give 38 per cent of the $25,000,000 in reduced taxes to the class of surtax payers, numbering about 17,000, who have incomes of over $70,000. Even the Senator from Pennsylvania does not think that any great injustice has been done to that class when he makes a comparison between the tax bills of 1917 and 1926, which amounted to 49 per cent, and the tax bills of 1918 and 1926, which amounted to between 53 and 66 per cent.

I repeat, the large percentage of the $25,000,000 to be given in reduced taxes is to go to a class of comparatively few taxpayers who have incomes of over $70,000, according to the plan of the majority. The minority contend that that class do not need to have their taxes reduced. Some of them have already had their tax bills reduced 66 per cent. Others have had their tax bills reduced from 53 to 66 per cent. That class is the last class that ought to get the benefit of this reduction of only $25,000,000 to individual taxpayers. There is the first important distinction between the minority and the majority.

The minority also think, if the surtaxes are to be reduced, that we should begin reducing them within the first bracket where surtaxes are exacted. We urge beginning the reduction in the very first bracket fixed in the present law and graduate our reductions upon that bracket of $10,000 up to the sum of $70,000. The result of that would be that instead of limiting the benefits of the reduction of $25,000,000 to 125,000 individuals the minority members would spread that reduction of $25,000,000 so it would reach 250,000 individual taxpayers. There is the second difference between the minority and the majority.

The minority report seeks to cut off the benefit that will come to those taxpayers who are in the brackets above $70,000 and to give it to those taxpayers who are in the brackets between $10,000 and $20,000.

To my mind the burdens of life to-day rest very heavily upon that class of business men, teachers, executives, and professional men who have families, who are trying to educate their children, who must live according to certain professional and social standards in their community, and whose income is only between $10,000 and $20,000. The man earning $12,000, who has two or more children to send to college and has to maintain a home in keeping with his social position, needs every dollar that he can save from tax requirements. I have a great deal of sympathy for that very large number of taxpayers who are enjoying incomes of only between $10,000 and $20,000. I think we will be rendering a service to them and to the country in helping to bring relief to them by including them in that class of surtax payers who are to receive the benefit of the reduction which has been provided for in the majority amendment.

It seems to me the issue is a very simple one. We all recognize that some reduction ought to be given to surtax payers. The question is, Where shall we begin and where shall we stop, and how widely shall we spread the reduction of $25,000,000? On the whole, it seems to me, the better plan proposed is the one proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, which takes the 38 per cent of the $25,000,000 reduction from the taxpayer with incomes in excess of $70,000 and gives it to those, not included by the majority, with an income of from $10,000 to $20,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is no use to get confused about this proposition. It is the same old issue that was presented in 1924 when the Mellon tax plan was submitted to Congress and when at that time we joined issue. One side contended that the large reduction should come to those higher up, the other to lift the burden from the man of moderate means, to enlarge the number for the payment of normal taxes, and to give greater reduction in the surtaxes to the larger number of more moderate means. It is the same proposition now. It is the same old fight over again.

I am not surprised that the distinguished Senator from Pittsburgh is making this fight. It is most appropriate that he should present the argument. He suffers from the same optical derangement that another citizen from Pittsburgh suffers. He employs the same kind of glasses. He has an able coadjutor in the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. He also is easily persuaded. This amendment is the work of Republican art. It is a very nicely drawn scheme, and to illustrate it a very splendid painting is there presented in the chart on the wall. The Senator from Pittsburgh is the proper teacher to demonstrate its value. The surprise is that the so-called insurgent group are permitting themselves to become apt and responsive pupils.

When we get back to the proposition, here is all it is: The difference between the committee amendment, upon which we will be called upon to vote, and the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina is that the Senator from North Carolina proposes by his amendment to relieve 91,000 taxpayers altogether from surtaxes; that he proposes to give about 310,000 income-tax payers, whose incomes are under $70,000, a reduction in taxes; but he denies a reduction in surtaxes to those whose incomes exceed $70,000. That class for the present has been taken care of. The committee amendment gives no reduction in surtaxes on incomes lower than $20,000, and all of the reduction of $25,000,000 that is given here by the committee amendment is given to those whose incomes are more than $20,000. There is the proposition. Take it or leave it.

The Senator from Pennsylvania said that we have not reduced the taxes of those in the $80,000 bracket. I submit we have reduced them. In 1926, when we considered the surtax proposition, it was admitted that there were certain brackets, I believe twenty-four thousand dollars to sixty thousand dollars-odd, that did not get as great a reduction proportionately as the others which were carried in that list. It was pointed out at that time by the minority members of the Finance Committee, when the first draft of the amendment was suggested, that it was grossly discriminatory against that class. Finally the majority of the committee appreciated in a degree the suggestion and rescinded their action and offered us a compromise proposition which gave to those within those brackets a greater reduction. But the reduction then granted was not as great as we wanted to give to them at that time, but that was the proposition which was finally adopted. I submit that is true to-day. That is why we are offering in the amendment a reduction to those people whose net incomes are under $70,000.

But the Senator said that the $80,000 income-tax payer is paying as much tax to-day as he was paying in surtaxes in war times in 1917. That can not be true. We have removed the excess-profits taxes, which benefited the man in the $80,000 bracket. We have reduced the capital-gain tax, which helped that particular class. The man who has an $80,000 income pays no normal tax on stock dividends. The man in the lower brackets, who does not make his investments to the extent that the man higher up does in corporations, pays his normal tax. Let us see what the figures show.

In 1917, on a $80,000 income, not taking into consideration the excess-profits tax that he then paid or the reduction that he got by virtue of the reduction in capital gain, a man paid $14,810 tax. In 1921 he paid $13,960. Under the 1924 law he paid $10,480. In 1926 he paid $7,860. His surtax was cut in half on the $80,000 income. Yet the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania would have us believe by his chart that there has been no reduction.

The issue is joined. Everybody understands it. If Senators on the other side of the Chamber who class themselves as insurgents want to go on record as voting for the Senate committee amendment, then let them do it and deny to millions of income-tax payers in the country, whose incomes are less than $20,000, the reduction which we offer to give and which the majority of the committee denies to them. I submit the proposition and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it is always a matter of great regret that I am obliged to differ with the Senator from Mississippi, but I think it is worth while calling the Senator's attention to this fact: At the present time a Senator or Member of the House receives a salary of $10,000 a year. We have so framed the law in 1926 that a person with that income pays no surtax whatever. If a Senator has, in addition to his salary, say, $4,000 a year from investments like rent, he has to pay a surtax then of $40 a year; he has to pay $10 every three months in surtaxes. While that is true, the architect, the engineer, the lawyer, who earns $70,000 a year, a very fine income, of course, has to pay $6,060 in surtaxes. Can we in simple honesty say that a $14,000 Senator, who pays $10 every three months in surtaxes, has a burden comparable with that borne by the doctor or the engineer who pays $6,060 a year in surtaxes?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like to call attention to this fact: Suppose a Senator or a doctor or a professional man of any kind has a net income of $20,000; he pays $618.75 income tax. The man who has five times that amount of income, or $100,000, pays an income tax of $16,058.75. The one pays 3 per cent and the other pays 16 per cent. That is the situation to-day. While the bill does not correct it as far as we believe it ought to be corrected, yet we have corrected it as far as we could at this time, and we have tried to correct the brackets that impose a higher tax to-day than in 1917 to bring them down on a perfect level with all the other taxes, as the chart will show.

Mr. President, the other day I made a statement that there were less than 400,000 taxpayers, both corporation and individuals, and one Senator questioned the figures. So I took the question up with the Treasury Department, and this is what the statistics show for the year 1925: Of taxable returns of corporations there were 143,887; of nontaxable returns of corporations there were 286,185. In other words, the number of nontaxable returns of corporations in the United States was just about double the number of taxable returns filed by corporations. Who is there in the United States who does not know what corporations are successful? Who does not know what these 143,887 corporations are?

Now, as to individual returns: The taxable returns of individuals for the same year—that is, for the year 1925—numbered 250,166 and the nontaxable returns of individuals—under the existing law they have to make returns but pay no taxes—numbered 1,669,885. In other words, the taxable returns for the year 1925 of both corporations and individuals numbered 2,645,053, which, of course, represents the number of taxpayers in the United States under the revenue law.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the committee amendment insert the following:

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. SMOOT asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Will the Chair state the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, after line 3, in lieu of the matter proposed by the committee, it is proposed to insert the following——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not ask that the amendment be read; I merely wanted the question stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). Upon this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I find that I can transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD]. I make that transfer and vote "nay."

Mr. WAGNER. I ask that I may be permitted to transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] to the junior senator from Iowa [Mr. STECK]. I make that transfer and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE];

So the amendment of Mr. SIMMONS to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand, we have not as yet agreed to the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is one other amendment matter to which I should like to have the attention of the Senate. I refer to the amendment on page 215, beginning in line 21, being "Section 509. Surtax rates for 1927." This amendment provides that the rates just agreed shall be retroactive, so that the taxpayers in paying the surtax for 1927 shall have credit according to the rates that we have just put into the bill. In other words, there is $25,000,000 involved in this amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Let us have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I should like to understand this proposition. I have just come from a committee meeting and I have had no opportunity to hear it explained.

Mr. SMOOT. If this amendment is adopted, the individual surtax payers of 1927 will receive a credit or a rebate of $25,000,000 upon whatever brackets we changed from existing law in the vote that was just taken by the Senate. In other words, it applies only to those brackets running between $20,000 and $80,000.

Mr. REED of Missouri. They will get a credit and nobody else?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the only change there is. Wherever there is a change in an individual bracket they get the credit.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does this apply to corporations?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it does not.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand this proposition, in a word it means that we discriminate in favor of a limited number of taxpayers—about 120,000—whose tax returns for the calendar year 1927 show that they have taxable incomes within the brackets ranging from $20,000 to $80,000. These favored persons are to receive a credit of $25,000,000 upon their surtax bills between the brackets just mentioned, which is to be retroactively applied.

While I am in favor of tax reduction, I am opposed to the proposition to apply retroactively, for the benefit of those who are paying in these high surtaxes, this large sum of $25,000,000, If there is to be retroactive tax reduction, we may well consider giving the benefits to those individuals whose incomes fall within lower brackets, or who pay only what we denominate the normal income tax, in contradistinction to the surtax.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am opposed to the committee amendment found on pages 215 and 216, and designated as section 509.

Section 12—surtax on individuals—of this bill, found on pages 10 to 14, inclusive, sets forth surtax rates upon individual net incomes; and such brackets, as amended by the Senate committee, reduce substantially the rate of surtax upon the larger incomes.

The committee amendment designated as section 509 proposes to make the reduced surtax rates as provided in section 12 applicable to surtax taxpayers for the calendar year of 1927.

If section 12 remains in the bill and if the committee amendment designated as section 509 is agreed to, the provisions of section 12 will be made retroactive, and will, therefore, authorize a credit or refund to such surtax taxpayers for the year 1927.

The proposed reduced rates as applicable to corporations are not made retroactive, and to date I have heard of no argument convincing or even persuasive to me as to why the surtax rates applicable to individuals should be made available to the relatively few taxpayers who enjoy the larger incomes—net incomes in excess of $20,000.

The only reason I have heard for section 509, the retroactive provision giving a refund to the larger individual taxpayers, is that such taxpayers are unable to pass such tax on to the general public or to the ultimate consumers of the country. Corporations are not accorded this special privilege for the reason, I am advised, that the corporations of the country have passed the tax on to the public, or to the consuming public, and that for this reason such corporations do not deserve or merit such refunds for the year 1927.

I agree with the committee action that no refund should be accorded corporations on account of taxes paid and to be paid for the calendar year 1927. I oppose the retroactive provisions applicable to individuals for such year, and favor placing individuals on the same plane as corporations. If the committee amendment designated as section 509 is not agreed to, no refunds will be authorized, the reduction in the tax rate on the larger incomes will not be made retroactive, corporations and individuals will be on the same plane, and each will pay tax for the calendar year 1927 as now provided by law.

Mr. President, permit me to call attention to a few facts which I am unable to harmonize with the committee action as proposed in section 509.

We have 120,013,000 people in the United States. This proposed section, if adopted, will give refunds to some 125,000 of the larger taxpayers and will afford no relief whatever to the other 119,888,000 citizens of the Nation.

The section, if agreed to, will give a refund of some $25,000,000 to the 125,000 favored large-income receivers, and from the information I have this will be deducted from the payments yet to be made and the payments already made.

If this section is agreed to, it will have the effect of a $25,000,000 appropriation from the Federal Treasury—an appropriation made or a gratuity given to the 125,000 large taxpayers of the country, and an appropriation of $25,000,000 for which the Government and the people get no benefit whatever.

It is represented that this bill, if and when enacted into law, will reduce taxes in the total sum of approximately $200,000,000. If the proposed section 509 is agreed to, it will authorize a refund or reduction in taxes to be paid in the further sum of $25,000,000. Hence the bill instead of being a $200,000,000 tax-reduction measure will in fact be a $225,000,000 tax-reducing law, and from the information I have it is asserted that the economy program of the administration can not stand a tax-reducing bill in so large a sum at this time.

At this point I might say that the amendment just adopted, I think on Saturday, afforded a further reduction of $24,000,000, so the bill as it now stands proposes to reduce taxes by a total sum of $224,000,000, and if this amendment is adopted it will add a still further reduction of $25,000,000, making $249,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will say to the Senator that he is mistaken there. This $25,000,000 will come out of the $401,000,000 surplus that was developed at the end of this year. It will not come out of the taxes proposed in this bill. That is the only mistake the Senator made.

Mr. THOMAS. I will stand on this proposition, Mr. President, that if this amendment is agreed to as offered by the Senator from Utah it will have the effect of a $25,000,000 appropriation made by this Congress, for which this Congress and the people get no benefit whatever—a simple gratuity, a gift to 125,000 taxpayers of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course this is the proposition here, and this is all there is in the amendment:

There was $401,000,000 surplus for 1927. All that we do here is to provide that where a taxpayer has made his return under the existing law—and it only affects the taxpayers between the $20,000 and $80,000 brackets—he will receive on his next payment of the taxes for 1927 whatever reduction he is entitled to by the new rates; and that does not come out of the revenue of the coming year. It comes out of the excess receipts of the preceding year. That is all there is to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KING. As I understand the proposition, it simply means this:

Taxes have been levied for the calendar year 1927 and returns have been made by the taxpayers. If my colleague or any other person has made a return showing an income within the brackets from $20,000 to $80,000, and has paid the tax in full, he would get a refund of 25 per cent. If he has paid only a part of it, when the next payment is to be made he obtains a credit representing 25 per cent of the total surtax, computed upon the income above $20,000 and below $80,000. If the amount of the surtax levied upon the income of an individual for the year 1927 and upon the income within the brackets referred to is, for illustration, $2,000, it will be reduced to $1,500, the $500 credit being applied retroactively.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I stated, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. I am glad we agree; but it is possible to state a proposition somewhat differently.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I was just going to ask the Senator from Utah, and I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma, why should the taxpayer get this refund at all?

Mr. THOMAS. There is no reason, so far as I can see, and no reason has been advanced, excepting this reason: It was stated in the committee that the corporations did not merit a refund for the reason that they had already collected the tax and had passed it on to the ultimate consumer. The statement was made that the individual taxpayer could not pass it on to the ultimate consumer, and for that reason he should have this refund; but I will say that every individual who could pass the tax on to the consumer or to some one else has done so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, what the Senator means is that under this arrangement the taxpayer will not only get this reduction for future years, but he will get the reduction for last year.

Mr. THOMAS. For 1927?

Mr. SIMMONS. For 1927.

Mr. THOMAS. And I might also state that a good portion of this tax has already been paid. While the law to-day permits the taxpayer to pay his taxes in four quarterly payments, the record shows that the individual taxpayer in a very large per cent of the cases pays his entire tax at the time the first installment is due; and I am advised that practically one-half or upward of one-half of the individual taxes have been paid already.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in these brackets.

Mr. THOMAS. I have that information from those who should know. Of course, I do not know myself.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is perfectly correct, taking all the small taxpayers into consideration, but not the taxpayers in these brackets only.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there any other class as to whom this retroactive clause is made effective?

Mr. THOMAS. It is made effective only as to individual taxpayers who have annual incomes between $20,000 and $70,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I understand that. Is it to that class alone, and to no other class of taxpayers, that this retroactive reduction is to be made?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it applies to everybody who gets any benefit under this bill. It applies to the million-dollar man as well as it does to the $20,000 man.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the Senator from California that in that particular I was in error. It applies to individual taxpayers who have incomes above $20,000. The income might be $1,000,000, it might be $5,000,000, it might be $20,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the amount involved is about $25,000,000?

Mr. THOMAS. The amount involved is estimated at $25,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, if we adopt this amendment, the income-tax payers of 1927 will pay $25,000,000 less?

Mr. THOMAS. That is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is right.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, it will have the same effect on those it does affect as though this bill were passed a year before it is passed?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is correct. It will have the same effect as if we made an appropriation of $25,000,000 from the Federal Treasury to-day; and instead of the Treasury getting the benefit of this $25,000,000, it will go to 125,000 taxpayers who have incomes above $20,000 annually.

Mr. FLETCHER. In other words, Mr. President, we say that we robbed them last year, and now we want to give it back to them.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Congress agrees to this provision, such agreement must be made over the protest of the administration. Such a provision will reduce the Treasury estimate for 1928 by the sum of $25,000,000. As I view this matter, the committee amendment can not be supported, because it will give a refund or a gratuity to a favored few who do not need it, and it is in conflict with the general policy of the Treasury and the administration.

The adoption of said section 509 will cost the Treasury even more than the amount of the refund of the sum of $25,000,000. In fact, it will cost very much more. If the refund is authorized, the Treasury Department will be compelled to enter into correspondence with each of the 125,000 individual taxpayers to be favored.

I am advised that it costs the sum of approximately $10 to prepare and send out a letter from the Treasury Department. Thus, if my information is correct, it will cost the sum of $1,250,000 to send a single letter to each of the 125,000 taxpayers affected; and, if my information is correct as to the cost of the routine business in the Treasury Department, the cost to the Government of administering the said section 509 will be many times the one and a quarter million of dollars, the estimated cost of sending a single letter to each of the several taxpayers to be favored.

I am advised that the 1924 tax bill authorized some rebates to the taxpayers for the year 1923, and that at this time adjustment cases relating to the 1923 refunds are still pending in the Income Tax Bureau of the Treasury Department.

Mr. President, the fact that the Treasury will lose a relatively large amount of money, the sum of $25,000,000; the fact that the average refund to each of the 125,000 taxpayers will amount to only $200 per capita; that much of this tax, approximately 50 per cent, has already been paid; the fact that it will take years to adjust such rebates proposed to be authorized; the fact that this gift, if authorized, will cost the other taxpayers of the country millions of dollars in the administration of the said authorization; these facts have led me to oppose the adoption of the said section 509, proposing to make the reductions carried in section 12 of the bill retroactive for the year 1927 and authorizing refunds to be made to the 125,000 individuals who receive and enjoy the larger incomes of the country.

The question will come on the motion to agree to the committee amendment, designated as section 509, and those who favor granting a rebate, or gratuity, in the sum of $25,000,000 to 125,000 of the larger-income taxpayers of the country will, of course, vote to support the committee amendment. I am opposed to such amendment and hope it will be defeated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. In his absence, not being able to get a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. STECK] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE];

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]; and

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 54, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. REED of Missouri Mr. President, while this matter is before the Senate, I want to ask the Senator from Utah if he thinks the revenues of the Government are such that we could have rebated this $25,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. That money has already been collected, and, of course, it could be paid out.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If it is kept in the Treasury, as it has been by this vote, why can not the levies made in the revenue bill be cut by $25,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. That is a different year.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But we have the money, no matter what year it is.

Mr. SMOOT. This is for 1929.

Mr. REED of Missouri. We have the money on hand. If we have already collected $25,000,000 which we do not need, why can we not carry it in the Treasury and reduce the taxes that are now to be levied?

Mr. SMOOT. The object of the Secretary of the Treasury was to reduce the taxes to those who are entitled to it, who did not get the reduction under the last act.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Regardless of that, we have $25,000,000 more than we need, and we are now levying more taxes. Having already collected that $25,000,000, can we not employ it for the expenses of the Government and cut down the levies made in this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. This could apply only to one year. This bill is for 1929–30. The $25,000,000 will be paid upon the debt of the Government of the United States.

Mr. REED of Missouri. One Senator says it has already been applied. If it has already been applied, how could we return it to the taxpayers?

Mr. SMOOT. As far as that is concerned, they buy the bonds of the United States. That is what they do with the money.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It has not already been applied, so that we can get it if we want to.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It is available if desired.

Mr. SMOOT. If there were a $25,000,000 reduction in this bill, that would apply only to one year, to 1929–30.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then why not apply it?

Mr. SMOOT. Because I do not think the Senate desires to apply the money that way. They would rather pay it on the debt of the Government.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is the Senator's opinion.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator a question. The Senator says that we have collected $25,000,000 more than we need. The Senate has just refused to give it back to the people from whom it was collected. Does the Senator suggest that, having collected it from that group, we should now give it to some other group?

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; I simply suggest that if we have $25,000,000 more in the Treasury than we need, and therefore can afford to return it, and the Senate has determined not to return it, the money then remains in the Treasury, and having $25,000,000 more than we need, we can well afford to reduce the levies to be made upon the people of the United States next year by that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. This money has not been collected for 1927. It has been assessed, and the first payment has been made.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But we are going to collect it. That is just going around the barn the other way. A moment ago the statement was made that we had it, and that we had already paid it on the debt. Now, we are told we have not got it at all, that we have to get it yet. I do not understand those statements. They confuse me.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the first payment of the tax has been made by some taxpayers, and some taxpayers pay the entire amount in advance. I understand that about one-half of the total amount has already been paid.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It follows, then, if only half has been paid, that it could not have been employed up to this date in paying the public debt.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator has said, as shown by his vote, that he does not approve of giving it back to the people from whom it was collected. He has just told us that he does not approve of keeping their money and giving it to somebody else or some other class of people. Would the Senator then be in favor of a further reduction of the surtax rate for the group from whom the money was collected?

Mr. REED of Missouri. That would depend on the equities of the proposition. I do not see that that has anything to do with the problem I am discussing, which is simply this: We have collected $25,000,000 which we do not need and could return. The Senate has said it should not be returned. The $25,000,000, therefore, rests in the Treasury or will be gathered into the Treasury from those who have not yet paid. That being the case, it seems to me the logical thing to do would be to reduce the levy made in this bill for the first year. That would relieve all the taxpayers who are so favored who are yet to pay their taxes.

I am just trying to get some light. We have $25,000,000 that we do not need, and if it has already been paid upon the debt of the Government, although it has not yet been collected, and if it is going to come into the Treasury, and if we are levying other taxes, we should not take into consideration the amount of money that is really here because it has not been paid on the public debt.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It seems to me the Senator's argument reaches the conclusion that we have not reduced the surtaxes enough.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, what about those people who are paying income taxes on incomes of $5,000 and over? I understand we can increase the exemption to $5,000 for all married men and $3,500 for all single men, and that it would cost the Government about $25,000,000. By doing that we could reach the great mass of common people in the country. Why not apply it in that way?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Because there is no demand for it.

Mr. DILL. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The great mass of the common people of the country do not want to be charity patients when it comes to having their Government paid for by other people.

Mr. DILL. The great mass of people of the country would like to have their taxes lowered.

Mr. SMOOT. The great mass of the people do not pay any taxes now at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes; they pay them all.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It seems to me the $25,000,000 might be put to some better use than merely to leave it in the Treasury.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask that the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes, be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator want to take up the conference report this afternoon?

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is what I am trying to do right now.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will not ask for a vote on it to-day. I would like to go over it before it is voted on. I have been out of the city for a day or two and I would like to go over the conference report before action upon it.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator be ready to proceed with it at the opening of the session to-morrow?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt about it. I have not examined it, but I have no doubt but that I shall be ready.

Mr. JONES. I would like to get it disposed of to-morrow at the latest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report goes over on request.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 15, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, May 14, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, we are all debtors to Thee for Thy continual goodness; hence we are inspired with a sense of thanksgiving and praise. How wonderful art Thou and yet how gentle! O may we behold wondrous things out of Thy law. Give to our understanding clear vision, that we may discern wisely Thy will concerning our public and private obligations. In the midst of the days remember mercy. May the secrets of our energy be in Thy wisdom and constraining love. Fill our memories with the sweetest and the best and the purest in our lives. Through all the light and through all the dark be with us. Amen.

The Journals of the proceedings of Saturday, May 12, 1928, and Sunday, May 13, 1928, were read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 13032. An act to amend the act of February 8, 1895, entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters"; and

H. R. 13037. An act to amend section 1, rule 2, rule 3, subdivision (e), and rule 9 of an act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters, enacted February 8, 1895 (ch. 64, 28 Stat. L. sec. 645).

The message further announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10159) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. NORBECK, Mr. DALE, and Mr. STECK to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12381) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, etc., and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. NORBECK, Mr. SHIPSTEAD, and Mr. BRATTON to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4321. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of two bridges on the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in Arizona, and for other purposes;

S. 3944. An act authorizing the President to present in the name of Congress gold medals of appropriate design to Clarence D. Chamberlain and Charles A. Levine;

S. 4229. An act to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River near and above the city of New Orleans, La.; and

S. 4276. An act granting a pension to Edith Bolling Wilson.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 3699. An act for the relief of the land-grant railroad operated between the station formerly known as East Portland, in the State of Oregon, and Roseville, in the State of California;

S. 3556. An act to insure adequate supplies of timber and other forest products for the people of the United States, to promote the full use for timber growing and other purposes of forest lands in the United States, including farm wood lots and those abandoned areas not suitable for agricultural production, and to secure the correlation and the most economical conduct of forest research in the Department of Agriculture, through research in reforestation, timber growing, protection, utilization, forest economics, and related subjects, and for other purposes; and

S. 3456. An act allowing the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army, to the medical officer assigned to duty as personal physician to the President.

The message further announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 82) entitled "Joint resolution providing for the erection of a public historical museum on the site of Fort Defiance, Defiance, Ohio," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. FESS, Mr. HOWELL, and Mr. MCKELLAR to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AIR MAIL

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short statement by the Postmaster General relative to the tenth anniversary of the use of the air mail.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, this is air-mail week. The tenth anniversary of national air mail service is also being celebrated.

As a part of the official notice being given these events, the Postmaster General has issued a statement covering the heroic achievements and concrete results which have marked the service.

Through the courtesy of the Postmaster General and the Washington Sunday Star, and the privilege granted me by the House, I am able to have a permanent record made of the national postal celebration.

The Postmaster General's statement as published in the Washington Sunday Star is as follows:

GETTING THE AIR MAIL THROUGH—HEROIC ACHIEVEMENTS AND CONCRETE RESULTS MARK SERVICE, SAYS POSTMASTER GENERAL

By Harry S. New, United States Postmaster General

The tenth anniversary of that first 219-mile flight between New York and Washington, which inaugurated our national air mail service, will be celebrated Tuesday by the Post Office Department.

Almost the same moment will mark the completion of two important links in the great transcontinental network of air-mail routes that exist to-day—those from Ogden, Utah, to San Francisco and from Albany to Cleveland. And still more interesting as a coincidence is the recent opening of a steady air mail service from New York southward through Washington, tying the North and the East to Richmond, Greensboro, Spartanburg, and Atlanta.

At noon on May 15, 1918, four pilots stood at their planes in New York, Philadelphia, and Washington, ready for the first air-mail flight. All four were lieutenants in the Army Air Corps, loaned for purposes of experiment to the Post Office Department.

While Lieutenant Webb started from New York, while Lieutenants Culver and Edgerton were waiting to relay the mail in Philadelphia, Lieutenant Boyle took off from Washington with a sack of air mail weighing about four pounds and a half. Boyle was forced down almost immediately, and Edgerton, coming in with the mail from New York via Philadelphia, took up that little sack of mail and carried it next day on his return flight to Philadelphia, whence Lieutenant Webb took it on to New York.

To-day 500,000 pounds of mail are carried through the air over millions of miles. A single sack now may go over lighted routes and by flood-lighted landing stations the entire 2,600 miles from New York to San Francisco.

LIKE FAR-OFF DREAM

When those first four pilots stood by their planes on that day in 1918 the time when this country would be netted across by great aerial mail routes, operating regularly on schedule, seemed to many a far-off dream. It was travel in a new dimension. If it was to be developed, it must be developed first by those who had the nerve to fly and then by those who had the nerve to back it financially.

Yet the dream of 10 years ago already has become only the starting point of a great vision for the future. Reaching out from our own country, we are already clasping hands through the air with our fellow peoples of the Western Hemisphere.

Working with the State Department and with the postmaster general of Mexico, we are now completing plans for an international air mail service as significant to the story of international relations as it is to the story of transportation. From New Orleans, by way of Tampico and Vera Cruz, American planes will complete a run which will make it possible to send a letter by air all the way from Boston to Mexico City.

Nor will the story end there. From New Orleans to Houston, by a projected three-way connection—to Brownsville, to Laredo, and San Antonio—it will be possible to connect with any route by which the Mexican service may enter the United States in the future.

PAN AMERICAN HOOK UP

Next we vision the hook up of the so-called Pan American countries. The department plans to establish air-mail routes to South America that will serve the Central American countries and create an air mail service extending from Boston and Seattle to Concepcion. And it is actually in process of negotiating agreements to pave the way for these lines, with good reason to hope for the fulfillment of its dreams.

From Habana, which already connects with us by air to Key West, the projected line would run southward and westward to Mexico,

Guatemala, Honduras, Salvador, and Costa Rica; thence into the Canal Zone, and from there drop southward along the western coast of South America through Colombia to Ecuador and Peru, reaching all the way down through to Chile, even south of the Chilean capital, as far as Concepcion.

Concepcion is chosen as the southern terminus of this hook-up, because it is opposite a low pass in the Andes where an easy connection can be made with Buenos Aires. From Buenos Aires, as every one knows, a French air service already is operating northward and eastward toward Europe.

About to be linked with the countries to the south we are just now also binding ourselves by air closer to Canada by the route just opened between Montreal and Albany. And, on the purely domestic side, it is safe to say that the American air mail service is surpassed by that of no other country.

Hanging in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, Irving Glover, is a great map at which I can never glance without a feeling of satisfaction at the status achieved in this brief time by the American air mail service.

WHAT MAP REVEALS

Pinned on that map of the United States are lines of red ribbons, blue ribbons, yellow ribbons, and brown ribbons. The red ribbons indicate lines now actually under operation. The blue ribbons indicate routes awarded but not yet operating. The yellow ribbons indicate routes proposed. The brown ribbons indicate hook-ups to foreign mail routes. The blue ribbons are constantly giving way to red ones; the yellow ones to blue. One glance at that map gives us history and gives us prophecy.

There, in the red lines with the regular daily air mail service they indicate, one observes Boston and New York linked to Cleveland, to Buffalo, to Chicago, and Detroit; to Pittsbrugh, Cincinnati, and St. Paul; to Omaha and Colorado Springs and Salt Lake City; to Boise in Idaho, and tied to the Pacific coast from Pasco, Wash., to San Francisco and Los Angeles.

There one sees air routes following the great natural divisions of our country. A great transcontinental line, from which branch from north to south the three great divisions of the East, the Middle West, and the West.

In the East, Boston and New York tie on southward to Atlanta, there throwing out two branches westward and eastward—one to Birmingham, Mobile, and New Orleans and thence to the Mexican hook-up of which I have already spoken; the other to Jacksonville and Miami to pick up the Pan American line.

One sees Chicago, in the Middle West, tied not only to the East, the North, and the West, but to the South by Kansas City, Wichita in Kansas, through Oklahoma to the Texas cities—Dallas and Fort Worth and Waco, Austin and San Antonio, Houston and Galveston. And one sees the west coast from Pasco, through Seattle to Portland, San Francisco, and Los Angeles in the far-flung line going back to New York.

SKEPTICISM 10 YEARS AGO

At this point we may observe certain significant features of that first flight 10 years ago. At that time there already had been certain spasmodic flights with mail. But the proposition of a regular schedule, operating in all kinds of weather, presented new difficulties. A great divergence of opinion existed among aeronautical experts at the time as to the possibility of the Post Office Department keeping up anything approaching a daily service. It was commonly said that the service would have to be abandoned during the winter months.

But there were some of us who were more optimistic. When I myself was a member of the subcommittee of the Senate on aeronautics I became profoundly interested in everything concerning aviation; I became a believer in its future. It is a faith I have never had to abandon.

Beginning with Army planes and flyers loaned for the purpose, in some three months the Post Office took over its own pilots.

At the end of the first year, with old-type planes and with all the difficulties of the new and experimental, we were able to report that of a possible 1,263 trips only 55 were not undertaken or failed to the extent of requiring the mail to be shipped by train.

VAST TOTAL CARRIED

When on June 30 of last year we turned the service over to private operation we could report a total of nearly 13,600,000 miles of air mail flown, carrying well on toward 300,000,000 pieces of mail, with a percentage of loss remarkably small. The record also shows that while there were over 4,000 forced landings on account of weather and something over 2,000 due to mechanical causes, only 32 crashes resulted in fatalities, causing the deaths of 32 pilots and of 9 other employees who accompanied them, nearly all of them during the first few experimental years of the service.

From July, 1926, to July, 1927, over 2,500,000 miles were flown and there were only two fatalities. What railroad or steamship company can point to a similar record?

That first flight between New York and Washington marked in more than one way the beginning of a great national experiment. It marked the beginning of an American policy in regard to mail aviation entirely different from the European.

Whereas among European countries it is commonly the case to provide subventions or government subsidies, the United States Post Office Department and I never, from the beginning, had any such purpose in mind.

The department believed and I believed as much in the future of commercial aviation as we did and do in the national value of private individual business energy.

POLICY NOW IN EFFECT

We began the operation of that first air-mail route with the distinct purpose in mind of making it a great national demonstration in the feasibility of commercial air transportation for mail. Once that had been demonstrated, we were willing to turn over the air mail to the operation of the same economic principles that are concerned in the transportation of mail by ships on sea or by train on land.

While European Governments subsidize seats, mail and express, we deal with the commercial air-mail companies in the matter of carrying mail as we deal with other transportation companies—with this difference, that the law requires all railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce to carry mail on request. That provision of the law does not apply to air-mail companies.

We advertise for bids on which we let the contracts for carrying air mail to be paid for in accordance with services rendered the Government. These bids vary from the lowest rate of 83 cents a pound to the highest rate of $3 a pound. In turn, instead of the land-mail price of 2 cents for one ounce or under, the air-mail stamp costs 10 cents for each half ounce or under in consideration of the greater speed of delivery.

And already these lines have begun to demonstrate the value of our idea. They are beginning to pay. One firm has paid a year's dividends in advance. Our first great experiment is becoming a demonstration in America's belief in sound business principles.

COST OF EXPERIMENT

During those laboratory years and during the performance of services highly valuable to the Government and to the future of American aviation, less than $16,250,000 of Uncle Sam's money was expended by the Post Office Department. Of this close to $2,250,000 was handed back for excess air postage on the transcontinental route during the two and one-half years from July, 1924, to February, 1927, alone. And at the end of that time the Post Office Department auctioned off 26 planes at an average price of around $7,000 apiece, gave some planes to the forest patrol for the work of fire prevention, 15 to the War Department, and some to the Department of Commerce for use in connection with the establishment and maintenance of lighted airways.

After all deductions are made, all we have paid for the greatest step in aviation history is $9,500,000.

In building up this service the Post Office Department gave night flying to the world and created an organization which, in the words of Lindbergh, is the envy of all Europe.

It was a demonstration in the feasibility of continuous air delivery. As soon as commercial aviation became strong enough it received not only the physical assets of governmental service, but also the technical knowledge built up through those first years of experience in this new field.

PRIVATE FIRMS CARRY ON

Coming into the department already an enthusiast, I have backed it as hard as I could, from the beginning. When we had demonstrated that it was possible to cross the continent with unfailing regularity except for impossible weather conditions—and, remember, even railroad trains are occasionally blockaded—I was ready to say that the service could be better carried on under private capital than by Uncle Sam. Uncle Sam had to make the demonstration. Uncle Sam had to show his nerve. It is up to the private firms to carry on.

That the experiment was successful is illustrated by the fact that to-day there are 21 commercial air firms actually carrying American mail, and requests are constantly coming in from every section of the country for the establishment of air-mail routes where such do not already exist.

These requests are the result of a growing recognition on the part of American business of the value of speedy communication. One recent example will illustrate:

Portland, Oreg., needed a new set of water meters. A firm in Newark, N. J., heard about it just as the date advertised for bids was about to expire. The Newark firm sent its bid by air mail. For that reason—and that reason only—the bid arrived in time to be considered, and the Newark firm got the contract.

Practical as it is the air mail has already given the country a record of performance equaled only by its record of devotion.

PILOTS ARE PRAISED

I have said that achievement was possible only through the nerve of the pilots and the nerve of the backers. And our pilots have shown in full measure they are the stuff of which heroes are made. "Bring the mail through!" That slogan of the Post Office in all its departments has inspired them, whether, like Lindbergh, they carried mail for private contractors or whether they date back to the days of Government operation.

I do not believe in "stunt flying." The public mind often credits to aviation a series of failures in efforts that could have been accomplished only by miracles—efforts doomed from the first. The attempt to accomplish the impossible can end only in defeat. I believe in the practical rather than the spectacular.

These 10 years since our first air-mail flight have been spectacular in their demonstration of the practical. And the records of the air-mail pilots glisten with stories of their abilities as flyers as well as of their personal heroism and their unfailing sense of humor. It is invidious to choose among them, perhaps. Yet a few illustrations, taken almost at random from the records, will give some idea of how they have brought the mail through.

SOME HEROIC FEATS

There was H. G. Boonstra. Forced down upon a rocky ledge 9,400 feet high, somewhere between Salt Lake City and Rock Springs, he crawled for 36 hours on his hands and knees through snow to an abandoned ranch house. Thence he got to a telephone. When he finally got back, got the mail, and brought it to Colesville, Utah, the whole town turned out with a band to celebrate his arrival.

When R. H. Ellis's plane literally stuck its nose into the perpendicular side of a mountain in Wyoming he rolled his mail down the ledge and got it through.

Eugene Johnson's ship fell straight down, in a flying position, for 1,500 feet, with Mount Rose ahead. Arm over eye, he waited the crash, when the wind struck the ship with a jar that carried it up and turned it in the opposite direction. And he got through with the mail.

J. H. Knight, flying by compass in the fog 8,000 feet up, as his gas gave out, dropped under the bank to find Lake Erie. He played hide and seek with the docks and dredges till he wormed the mail home.

Paul Scott, out in Nevada, took the mail into a hole in the fog in Saddle Pass. The fog closed down. He banked, turned to come out with a visibility of 20 feet, leveled and started climbing, when he found he was scraping the tops of the trees. Crashed at 8,200 feet on the edge of the pass, he found his left shoulder out of joint and his left arm beginning to freeze. He noticed he had a cigarette. Then he noticed he had left his gun. Then he noticed the heavy fog, giving no sun for bearings. Then he noticed he was lucky to be able to notice anything. Struggling through the snow, he slipped on a rocky ledge and slid and tumbled 1,000 feet; it put his shoulder back into joint and restored the circulation. He got through to the railroad.

FLAMES FAIL TO STOP HIM

Wesley Smith found flames bursting through the motor wall at his feet. Though the fire burned through the motor cowling and singed his face and clothing, he was calm enough to send his companion into the cabin to pile all the mail as far back as possible. Then he managed to "bring the mail through" by a clever landing in a cornfield.

"Benny" Eielson, who recently crossed the Arctic with Capt. George H. Wilkins, was made a chief of the Yukon Indians under the sobriquet of "Moose Ptarmigan" when, back in 1924, he brought the mail through dark and snowstorms into a country that previously had known only dog teams.

Before the completely mapped air routes, the lighted airways of to-day, R. B. Levisce owed his life to his memory for air landmarks. Running out of gas, oil, and water 20 miles east of Placerville, he suddenly remembered a certain pear-shaped clearing he had observed on previous flights. From 8,000 feet up he made a "dead-stick" landing—and brought the mail through.

Frequently when the department asks its pilots for a report of their experiences it is hard to get anything. It is all in the day's work for them. Often a situation which would make a story writer's reputation as a thriller is turned off in a jest. Take, for example, one of the reports of J. D. Hill, who afterwards was lost with Bertaud, another air pilot, on their tragic attempt to fly to Rome.

WHAT HILL ENCOUNTERED

During a certain trip westward from New York under a low barometer he struck a driving rain. Let Hill tell it:

"Mail held until noon on account of bad weather. I took off about 12.10 at Garden City; pyrene hitting the back of my legs suggested a rough trip. * * * I crossed the Delaware at Trenton and what was bad became worse. Rain became more rain; more rain became water. I discovered that one gray patch was trees, another water, and still another clouds. Every time I saw a 'W' on the compass I headed for it.

"There were no automobiles on the roads, no birds, but millions of little things began to whiz by me, and as a fairly big one went by I looked back quickly and saw a fin, and realized they were fish. All those little ones must have been sardines, and I never knew before they grew close together like that.

"Anyway there I was with a fire extinguisher and a parachute praying for a lifeboat. * * * I saw a line of automobiles that seemed natural enough, but that band of flowers and the pipe organ were queer.

"I got back into clear water, rose a bit, and finally came out to where it was only raining. I saw fields, and after a time sat down in one. A man came out of a barn and said Lancaster was only 16 miles west * * * cold, wet, and hungry, and I never got a gol-darned fish!

"Sixteen people were drowned in Pennsylvania that day, and I suppose I would have been drowned, too, if it hadn't been for the fan on the front of my ship. My observation on this trip is that the D. H. has too many wires for an airplane and not enough for a fish net."

HUMORIST REVEALS SELF

For pure, unadulterated American humor, take an official report made by Kenneth Unger:

"I was crossing the Rubbie Mountains one day at about 10,500 feet when I broke a set of gears and landed in a very small field in the Secret Pass. A rancher riding range saw me land and rode over and let me take his horse to ride to the nearest ranch.

"After phoning to Elko for help I started back to the ship on horse. I started to mount and the horse took off in a climbing turn before I got in the seat and had my safety belt fastened.

"To make a long story short, I overcontrolled her nose, went down, and I spun or sideslipped—I don't know which—into the ground with great speed.

"I broke my left ankle and was well shaken up by this second forced landing.

"After filling the air with smoke for a few minutes I got the beast again and we took off in a gentle lope and returned to the ship. Help came; we repaired the motor and I flew the ship to Elko. There I had the ankle set by one of the best doctors in town.

"I had the luck to borrow a pair of crutches made for a man 6 feet tall, and as I am 5 foot 7 we got along fine. I had the boys at the field tack a strap on the right rudder bar so I could pull as well as push. This made up for the loss of my left foot. I took off for Salt Lake with the regular mail as usual.

"Motto: Always be sure you have your belt on before you take off with a Western horse."

TEX MARSHALL'S LANDING

There is the same kind of laugh in another pilot, "Tex" Marshall, who wrote in, after a clever landing under adverse conditions, that a man came up to him on the field and said:

"Mr. Marshall, my name is Votaw, and I want to tell you that I never saw anyone come so near hitting so many different things in such a short time and miss 'em all. I want to congratulate you or sympathize with you—I don't know which!"

Perhaps the classic of all is the report of Dean Smith:

"Dead sticked—flying low—only place available—on cow—killed cow—wrecked plane—scared me—Smith."

Whether the story is one of straightway courage or the whimsical tale of the humorous or the reticence of those who report "nothing happened worth telling about," one sentiment of devotion to the service and desire to help aviation inspired all true pilots. The world has seen in Lindbergh the inspiration of that devotion. It exists also in many others less renowned.

It is, first of all, due to men like these that the last decade has seen such a remarkable growth in mail aviation.

INSPIRING WORDS OF PEARSON

I can not close a discussion of this subject without including some lines which contain the most moving words I have read in recent years, lines contained in the letters written by Brooke Pearson, an air-mail pilot, to his mother and his fellow pilots. They are so inspiring that I shall set them down here just as his mother and his fellow aviators read them—after he had crashed:

"DEAR MOTHER: I trust your eyes may never see this, but should God desire that you do, you at least know He has called me like many more who have given their lives for the future of this wonderful game. I was possibly wrong in not giving it up; possibly I might have thought the same, but I choose to keep at it and only pray that something of use has been learned.

"The world in general calls us silly fools, but it's the silly fools who make the sacrifices, that help to perfect any great thing that the world in general greatly benefits by later.

"My dearest mother, I say farewell, au revoir, for a time only, as I hope we will meet again. Keep a brave heart. I pray God to look after you, as you have struggled as no other mother has to make ends meet. 'It's always darkest just before the dawn.' I. L. Y. A.

"BROOKE."

"STICK TO IT, BOYS"

And to his fellow pilots words which in the light of after events take on the glowing aspiration of this game youth and the future:

"MY DEAR FRIENDS: I go west, but with a cheerful heart. I hope what small sacrifice I have made may be of use to the 'game.' When we fly we are damned fools, they say; when you're dead you weren't half a bad fellow.

"Everyone in this wonderful aviation is doing the world far more good than they appreciate.

"We risk our necks, give our lives to perfect an invention for the benefit of the world at large, so that they may benefit in years to come. They, mind you, are the very ones who call us fools.

"Stick to it, boys. I'm still very much with you.

"See you all again.

"'JAP' PEARSON."

Ten years of air-mail history contain a record of splendid human achievement and a prophecy of greater things to come.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a paper issued by the National Fertilizer Association containing the names of the representatives of fertilizer companies who are here in Washington opposing the Morin bill, and also to extend my own remarks with reference to this statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a statement from the National Fertilizer Association in regard to Muscle Shoals, and to extend his own remarks with reference to this paper. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, how long is that statement? Is that the brief that they have sent to all Members?

Mr. ALMON. Yes; I reckon they all got it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If that is the document that all of us got in the mail, I do not see the necessity for printing it in the RECORD.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

INTERNATIONAL PETROLEUM EXPOSITION AT TULSA, OKLA.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House Joint Resolution 292, passed by the House on Saturday last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in passing House Joint Resolution 292, entitled "A joint resolution authorizing the President to invite the States of the Union and foreign countries to participate in the International Petroleum Exposition at Tulsa, Okla., to begin October 20, 1928," the House has rendered a distinct service to the petroleum industry, and one that will be of material benefit to the commercial activities of the Nation.

This resolution will be of such far-reaching benefit that in passing I desire to extend my sincere thanks to the Speaker of the House, the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, who, after satisfying himself that it was a meritorious measure, in his usual able and courteous manner assisted me in bringing it before the House and in its passage. Also I want to extend my thanks to the distinguished gentlemen of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House for the assistance they rendered the petroleum industry and our commercial interests by giving prompt and thorough attention to the resolution and reporting it favorably to the House for action. Especially also do I desire to call attention to the petroleum industry and its allied interests, including the manufacturers of machinery and equipment used in the industry, to the valuable assistance rendered by the Hon. STEPHEN G. PORTER, of Pittsburgh, Pa., in assisting in securing this recognition on the part of the United States Government. Representing a great industrial district, Mr. PORTER was quick to realize that many exhibitors, and of those who would benefit by the resolution, were from his district in Pittsburgh, and his services in the matter were invaluable. I congratulate the great industrial district of Pittsburgh upon having in the House of Representatives this gentleman who has become an international figure and yet who is always prompt and decisive in acting upon matters beneficial to the great industrial district he represents and the commercial interests of the United States.

But what of the International Petroleum Exposition? To the uninformed it might seem to be a small local and ineffective show, but such is not the case. It is "the world's fair of the petroleum industry." It is a world's fair maintained at the expense of the petroleum industry and its allied interests, without the hope of profit but for the purpose of increasing and stimulating commercial and scientific activities in the petroleum industry of the world.

Already the exposition, which has been held through the efforts of the patriotic men and women of the oil industry, has resulted in the sale of manufactured products of the factories of America of millions of dollars' worth of American-made goods in foreign countries. No doubt the Government recognition extended in this resolution will materially increase these results.

It is the only petroleum exposition held anywhere in the United States, and, so far as I know, the only one held in the world.

It is a permanent, established, annual exposition founded in 1923 and held every year since that time except in the year 1926.

It is housed in a plant of its own, provided by the men and women of the oil industry, costing over $100,000, and built and maintained exclusively for the use of the exposition on its own site of 20 acres.

At the exposition held in 1927 more than 300 manufacturers and distributors of oil-industry equipment exhibited their products in displays which covered more than a lineal mile and a half of exhibits. These displays, which included every conceivable kind of machinery, engines, tools, and devices, as well as scientific and technical instruments, were valued at more than $8,000,000, and the prospects are that at the 1928 exposition at least $10,000,000 worth of these goods will be on exhibition.

Among the Federal and State departments and bureaus, educational institutions, and oil-industry associations and organizations which have always participated in the exposition with exhibits, demonstrations, and other activities are the United States Geological Survey; United States Bureau of Mines; Oklahoma, Kansas, Missouri, and other State geological surveys; American Association of Petroleum Geologists; American Petroleum Institute; Mid-Continent Oil and Gas Association; Natural Gasoline Manufacturers' Association.

The 1927 exposition was officially opened by the President of the United States.

The exposition attendance is world-wide, representatives of 20 foreign countries and many foreign oil companies throughout the world attending last year. The total attendance at the exposition was over 100,000.

The exposition is a nonprofit institution, whose sole purpose is to advance the interests of the second largest American industry and to improve the industrial, economic, and social welfare of the Nation through improved methods, increased efficiency, elimination of waste, and reduced costs in the producing, refining, and marketing of petroleum products.

The permanent home of this exposition is at the city of Tulsa, Okla. For many reasons Tulsa is the perfectly logical location for it. Among these reasons may be listed the fact that in the city of Tulsa there are more than 1,200 operating oil companies and individuals; there is perhaps not a large oil company operating in the United States that does not have its headquarters or offices in the city of Tulsa; the largest oil banks of the world are located there; naturally many manufacturing plants manufacturing oil-field supplies and equipment have sought locations in this oil capital of the world, and from it are already shipping their products to every country in which petroleum is produced.

Naturally this has made of Tulsa not only the oil center of the world, but, by reason of this, there live and have their homes within the city more men and women interested in the petroleum industry than in any other community in the Nation. It is these men and women who have, without the hope of profit but with the desire to increase the commercial activities of the Nation, built up this great industrial and scientific exposition.

In addition to the exposition there is held in connection with it a congress of the representatives of the oil industry of the world and at this congress scientific authorities on oil products, the manufacture of by-products of crude oil, and of scientific and geological questions entering into the development, manufacture, and transportation of oil and its by-products are discussed and the latest improved methods of improving and refining oil set forth in elaborate papers. The best-known authorities attend this congress and it is one of the attractive features of the exposition. The larger oil companies bring their field men, superintendents, and production men to Tulsa from all the oil-producing States of America in order that through this exposition and congress they may have an opportunity to familiarize themselves with the most modern and up-to-date machinery and processes developed for use of the industry. It has been frequently said by distinguished authorities attending the exposition and congress that it has contributed more to the proper and scientific development of oil and the manufacture of its by-products than any other factor at work in the Nation for the development of the industry.

Mr. Speaker, these are some, but only a few, of the reasons why I felt justified in asking the Congress to pass House Joint Resolution 292, authorizing the President of the United States to officially invite foreign countries to participate in this exposition and congress.

In conclusion let me urge upon the Members of the House and all who may read this, that if you are interested in the development of the commercial activities of the Nation and want to observe a great national institution which private, patriotic, and industrious citizens have built up without subsidy of any kind, but which has already been of far-reaching benefit, I invite you to come to Tulsa on October 20, 1928, to observe and participate in the Fifth Annual International Petroleum Exposition and Congress which has been built to its present greatness by the industrious, patriotic, and loyal citizens of the city of Tulsa, "The oil capital of the world."

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House on Thursday, May 17, after the reading of the Journal and the conclusion of the routine business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table on Thursday next, he be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, on what subject.

Mr. GRIFFIN. On Senate Joint Resolution 121, which is the Butler resolution, about the appointment of a commission for the study of safety devices on submarines.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LETTER OF THANKS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

To the Members of the House of Representatives, care of Speaker Longworth.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: We are deeply touched by the many beautiful tributes you have paid to our dear one and we wish to thank you as best we can by mere words, not only for the beautiful flowers but for the love and devotion which were expressed by them and by the beautiful special session and the days of adjournment and the resolutions sent to us of condolence and bereavement—and for the glorious flag at half-mast. All these were tokens of respect and devotion, and we feel that in the hearts of each and every one of you there is grief and sadness over his passing. But we want to pass on to you our feeling of hope and faith and thankfulness. Faith that he still lives and is carrying on for the ages. Hope that we can all carry on as he would have us. And thankfulness that he was spared illness and suffering and that he went on just as he wished—at his post and in full possession of all his God-given attributes.

With sincere gratitude and deep appreciation, we are,

JOSEPHINE SMART MADDEN.
MABEL MADDEN HENDERSON.
PAUL HENDERSON.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill S. 744, to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine calls up a conference report upon the merchant marine bill, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the managers.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"TITLE I—DECLARATION OF POLICY

"SEC. 1. The policy and the primary purpose declared in section 1 of the merchant marine act, 1920 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 861), are hereby confirmed.

"TITLE II—SHIPPING BOARD VESSELS

"SALES BY BOARD

"SEC. 201. The United States Shipping Board shall not sell any vessel or any line of vessels except when in its judgment the building up and maintenance of an adequate merchant marine can be best served thereby, and then only upon the affirmative vote of five members of the board duly recorded.

"REMODELING AND IMPROVING

"SEC. 202. In addition to its power to recondition and repair vessels under section 12 of the merchant marine act, 1920, as amended (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 871), the board may remodel and improve vessels owned by the United States and in its possession or under its control, so as to equip them adequately for competition in the foreign trade of the United States. Any vessel so remodeled or improved shall be documented under the laws of the United States and shall remain documented under such laws for not less than five years from the date of the completion of the remodeling or improving and so long as there remains due the United States any money or interest on account of such vessel, and during such period it shall be operated only on voyages which are not exclusively coastwise.

"REPLACEMENTS

"SEC. 203. The necessity for the replacement of vessels owned by the United States and in the possession or under the control of the board and the construction for the board of additional up-to-date cargo, combination cargo and passenger, and passenger ships, to give the United States an adequate merchant marine, is hereby recognized, and the board is authorized and directed to present to Congress from time to time, recommendations setting forth what new vessels are required for permanent operation under the United States flag in foreign trade, and the estimated cost thereof, to the end that Congress may, from time to time, make provision for replacements and additions. All vessels built for the board shall be built in the United States, and they shall be planned with reference to their possible usefulness as auxiliaries to the naval and military services of the United States.

"TITLE III—CONSTRUCTION LOAN FUND

"TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF LOANS

"SEC. 301. (a) Section 11 of the merchant marine act, 1920, as amended (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 870; 44 Stat. L., pt. 2, 1451), is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 11. (a) That the board may set aside, out of the revenues from sales, including proceeds of securities consisting of notes, letters of credit, or other evidences of debt, taken by it for deferred payments on purchase money from sales by the board, whether such securities are to the order of the United States, the United States Shipping Board, the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, or the United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation, either directly or by indorsement, until the amounts thus set aside from time to time aggregate $125,000,000. The amount thus set aside shall be known as the construction loan fund. The board may use such fund to the extent it thinks proper, upon such terms as the board may prescribe, in making loans to aid persons citizens of the United States in the construction by them in private shipyards or navy yards in the United States of vessels of the best and most efficient type for the establishment or maintenance of service on lines deemed desirable or necessary by the board, provided such vessels shall be fitted and equipped with the most modern, the most efficient, and the most economical engines, machinery, and commercial appliances; or in the outfitting and equipment by them in private shipyards or navy yards in the United States of vessels already built, with engines, machinery, and commercial appliances of the type and kind mentioned; or in the reconditioning, remodeling, or improvement by them in private shipyards or navy yards in the United States of vessels already built.

"'(b) The term "vessel" or "vessels," where used in this section, shall be construed to mean a vessel or vessels to aid in whose construction, equipment, reconditioning, remodeling, or improvement, a loan is made from the construction loan fund of the board. All such vessels shall be documented under the laws of the United States and shall remain documented under such laws for not less than 20 years from the date the loan is made, and so long as there remains due the United States any principal or interest on account of such loan.

"'(c) No loan shall be made for a longer time than 20 years. If it is not to be repaid within two years from the date when the first advance on the loan is made by the board, the principal shall be payable in equal annual installments to be definitely prescribed in the instruments. The loan may be paid at any time, on 30 days' written notice to the board, with interest computed to date of payment.

"'(d) All such loans shall bear interest at rates at follows, payable not less frequently than annually: During any period in which the vessel is operated exclusively in coastwise trade, or is inactive, the rate of interest shall be as fixed by the board, but not less than 5¼ per cent per annum. During any period in which the vessel is operated in foreign trade the rate shall be the lowest rate of yield (to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent) of any Government obligation bearing a date of issue subsequent to April 6, 1917 (except postal-savings bonds), and outstanding at the time the loan is made by the board, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to the board upon its request. The board may prescribe rules for determining the amount of interest payable under the provisions of this paragraph.

"'(e) No loan shall be for a greater sum than three-fourths the cost of the vessel or vessels to be constructed or than three-fourths the cost of the reconditioning, remodeling, improving, or equipping hereinbefore authorized for a vessel already built.

"'(f) The board shall require such security as it shall deem necessary to insure the completion of the construction, reconditioning, remodeling, improving, or equipping of the vessel within a reasonable time and the repayment of the loan with interest; when the construction, reconditioning, remodeling, improving, or equipping of the vessel is completed the security shall include a preferred mortgage on the vessel, complying with the provisions of the ship mortgage act, 1920 (U. S. C., title 46, chap. 25), which mortgage shall contain appropriate covenants and provisions to insure the proper physical maintenance of the vessel, and its protection against liens for taxes, penalties, claims, or liabilities of any kind whatever, which might impair the security for the debt. It shall also contain any other covenants and provisions the board may prescribe, including a provision for the summary maturing of the entire debt, for causes to be enumerated in the mortgage.

"'(g) The board shall also require and the security furnished shall provide that the owner of the vessel shall keep the same insured against loss or damage by fire, and against marine risks and disasters, and against any and all other insurable risks the board specifies, with such insurance companies, associations, or underwriters, and under such forms of policies, and to such an amount, as the board may prescribe or approve; such insurance shall be made payable to the board and/or to the parties, as interest may appear. The board is authorized to enter into any agreement that it deems wise in respect to the payment and for the guaranty of premiums of insurance.'

"(b) Section 11 of the merchant marine act, 1920, as in force immediately prior to the enactment of this act, shall remain in force in respect of all loans made before the enactment of this act.

"INCREASE OF CONSTRUCTION LOAN FUND

"SEC. 302. (a) There is authorized to be appropriated, to be credited to and for the purposes of the construction loan fund created by section 11 of the merchant marine act, 1920, as amended, such amounts as will, when added to the amounts credited to such fund by the United States Shipping Board under authority of law (exclusive of repayments on loans from the fund), make the aggregate of the amounts credited to such fund (exclusive of such repayments) equal to $250,000,000.

"(b) When $250,000,000 has been credited to such fund (whether by the board under authority of law or from appropriations authorized by this section, but exclusive of repayments on loans from the fund) then no further sums (except such repayments) shall be credited by the board to such fund.

"(c) The construction loan fund shall continue to be a revolving fund. Repayments on loans from the fund shall be credited to the fund, but interest on such loans shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"TITLE IV—OCEAN MAIL SERVICE

"SCOPE OF TITLE

"SEC. 401. All mails of the United States carried on vessels between ports (exclusive of ports in the Dominion of Canada other than ports in Nova Scotia) between which it is lawful under the navigation laws for a vessel not documented under the laws of the United States to carry merchandise shall, if practicable, be carried on vessels in respect of which a contract is made under this title.

"REQUIREMENTS OF POSTAL SERVICE

"SEC. 402. As soon as practicable after the enactment of this act, and from time to time thereafter, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to certify to the United States Shipping Board what ocean mail routes, in his opinion, should be established and/or operated for the carrying of mails of the United States between ports (exclusive of ports in the Dominion of Canada other than ports in Nova Scotia) between which it is lawful under the navigation laws for a vessel not documented under the laws of the United States to carry merchandise, distributed so as equitably to serve the Atlantic, Mexican Gulf, and Pacific coast ports, the volume of mail then moving over such routes and the estimated volume thereof during the next five years, the times deemed by him advisable for the departure of the vessels carrying such mails, and other requirements necessary to provide an adequate postal service between such ports.

"RECOMMENDATIONS BY SHIPPING BOARD

"SEC. 403. The board shall, as soon as practicable after receipt of such certification from the Postmaster General, determine and certify to him the type, size, speed, and other characteristics of the vessels which should be employed on each such route, the frequency and regularity of their sailings, and all other facts which bear upon the capacity of the vessels to meet the requirements of the service stated by the Postmaster General. The board in making its determination shall take into consideration the desirability of having the mail service performed by vessels constructed in accordance with the latest and most approved types, with modern improvements and appliances.

"AUTHORITY TO MAKE CONTRACTS

"SEC. 404. The Postmaster General is authorized to enter into contracts with citizens of the United States whose bids are accepted, for the carrying of mails between ports (exclusive of ports in the Dominion of Canada other than ports in Nova Scotia) between which it is lawful under the navigation laws for a vessel not documented under the laws of the United States to carry merchandise. He shall include in such contracts such requirements and conditions as in his best judgment will insure the full and efficient performance thereof and the protection of the interests of the Government. Performance under any such contract shall begin not more than three years after the contract is let, and the term of the contract shall not exceed 10 years.

"VESSELS

"SEC. 405. (a) The vessels employed in ocean-mail service under a contract made under this title shall be steel vessels, shall be steam or motor vessels, and shall be either (1) American-built and registered under the laws of the United States during the entire time of such employment, or (2) registered under the laws of the United States not later than February 1, 1928, and so registered during the entire time of such employment, or (3) actually ordered and under construction for the account of citizens of the United States prior to February 1, 1928, and registered under the laws of the United States during the entire time of such employment.

"(b) A vessel for the services of which a contract is entered into under authority of this title, and the construction of which is hereafter begun, shall be either (1) a vessel constructed, according to plans and specifications approved by the Secretary of the Navy, with particular reference to economical conversion into an auxiliary naval vessel, or (2) a vessel which will be otherwise useful to the United States in time of national emergency.

"(c) From and after the enactment of this act, all licensed officers of vessels documented under the laws of the United States, as now required by law, shall be citizens of the United States; from and after the enactment of this act and for a period of four years, upon each departure from the United States of a vessel employed in ocean-mail service under this title, one-half of the crew (crew including all employees of the ship other than officers) shall be citizens of the United States and, thereafter, two-thirds of the crew as above defined shall be citizens of the United States.

"ADVERTISING FOR BIDS

"SEC. 406. Before making any contract for carrying ocean mails under this title the Postmaster General shall give public notice by advertisement once a week for three weeks in such daily newspapers as he shall select in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, Charleston, Norfolk, Savannah, Jacksonville, Galveston, Houston, and Mobile, calling for bids for carrying of such ocean mails; or when the proposed service is to be on the Pacific Ocean then in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Tacoma, and Seattle. Such notice shall describe the proposed route, the time when such contract will be made, the number of trips a year, the schedule required, the time when the service shall commence, the character of the vessels required, and all other information deemed by the Postmaster General to be necessary to inform prospective bidders as to the character of the service to be required.

"AWARDING CONTRACTS

"SEC. 407. Each contract for the carrying of ocean mails under this title shall be awarded to the lowest bidder who, in the judgment of the Postmaster General, possesses such qualifications as to insure proper performance of the mail service under the contract.

"CLASSIFICATION OF VESSELS

"SEC. 408. (a) The vessels employed in ocean mail service under this title shall be divided into classes as follows:

"Class 7. Vessels capable of maintaining a speed of 10 knots at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 2,500 tons.

"Class 6. Vessels capable of maintaining a speed of 10 knots at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 4,000 tons.

"Class 5. Vessels capable of maintaining a speed of 13 knots at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 8,000 tons.

"Class 4. Vessels capable of maintaining a speed of 16 knots at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 10,000 tons.

"Class 3. Vessels capable of maintaining a speed of 18 knots at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 12,000 tons.

"Class 2. Vessels capable of maintaining a speed of 20 knots at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 16,000 tons.

"Class 1. Vessels capable of maintaining a speed of 24 knots at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 20,000 tons.

"(b) The classification of a vessel may be based upon its speed without regard to its tonnage if the Postmaster General is of opinion that speed is especially important on the particular route on which the vessel is to be employed, and that a suitable vessel documented under the laws of the United States of a higher classification is not available on reasonable terms and conditions, or, on account of the character of the ports served or for other reasons, can not be safely or economically employed on such route.

"COMPENSATION UNDER CONTRACTS

"SEC. 409. (a) The rate of compensation to be paid under this title for ocean-mail service shall be fixed in the contract. Such rate shall not exceed: For vessels of class 7, $1.50 per nautical mile; for vessels of class 6, $2.50 per nautical mile; for vessels of class 5, $4 per nautical mile; for vessels of class 4, $6 per nautical mile; for vessels of class 3, $8 per nautical mile; for vessels of class 2, $10 per nautical mile; and for vessels of class 1, $12 per nautical mile. As used in this section the term 'nautical mile' means 6,080 feet.

"(b) When the Postmaster General is of opinion that the interests of the Postal Service will be served thereby, he may, in the case of a vessel of class 1 capable of maintaining a speed in excess of 24 knots at sea in ordinary weather, contract for the payment of compensation in excess of the maximum compensation authorized in subsection (a), but the compensation per nautical mile authorized by this subsection shall not be greater than an amount which bears the same ratio to $12 as the speed which such vessel is capable of maintaining at sea in ordinary weather bears to 24 knots.

"(c) If the Postmaster General is of opinion that to expedite and maintain satisfactory service under a contract made under this title, airplanes or airships are required to be used in conjunction with vessels, he may allow additional compensation, in amounts to be determined by him, on account of the use of such airplanes or airships. Such airplanes or airships shall be American-built and owned, officered, and manned by citizens of the United States.

"(d) The Postmaster General shall determine the number of nautical miles by the shortest practicable route between the ports involved and payments under any contract made under this title shall be made for such number of miles on each outward voyage regardless of the actual mileage traveled.

"VIOLATION OF CONTRACTS

"SEC. 410. In the case of failure of a vessel from any cause to perform any regular voyage required by a contract made under this title, a pro rata deduction shall be made from the contract price on account of such omitted voyage; and suitable deductions, to be determined by the Postmaster General, may be made from the compensation payable under the contract for delays, failures to properly safeguard the mails, or other irregularities in the performance of the contract. Deductions so determined upon shall be deducted by the Postmaster General from the payments otherwise due and payable under the terms of the contract. The Postmaster General may, in case of emergency, permit the substitution for a particular voyage of a vessel not within the provisions of the contract, even thought not conforming to the requirements of section 405.

"PASSENGERS, FREIGHT, AND EXPRESS

"SEC. 411. Any vessel operating under a contract made under this title may carry passengers and their baggage, and freight and express, and may do all ordinary business done by similar vessels.

"NAVAL OFFICERS

"SEC. 412. Naval officers of the United States on the active list may volunteer for service on any vessel employed in mail service under a contract made under the provisions of this title, and when accepted by the owner or master thereof may be assigned to such duty by the Secretary of the Navy. While in such employment such officers shall receive from the Government half pay, exclusive of allowances, and such other compensation from the owner or master as may be agreed upon by the parties; but such officers while in such employment shall be required to perform only such duties as appertain to the merchant marine.

"MAIL MESSENGERS

"SEC. 413. Upon each vessel employed in ocean mail service under a contract made under this title, the Postmaster General shall be entitled to have transported such mail messengers as he may require, for whom shall be provided subsistence, suitable staterooms, and working quarters, all free of charge.

"AMENDMENTS AND REPEALS

"SEC. 414. (a) Section 24 of the merchant marine act, 1920 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 880), is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 24. That all mails of the United States shipped or carried on vessels shall, if practicable, be shipped or carried on American-built vessels documented under the laws of the United States. No contract hereafter made with the Postmaster General for carrying mails on vessels so built and documented shall be assigned or sublet, and no mails covered by such contract shall be carried on any vessel not so built and documented. No money shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States on or in relation to any such contract for carrying mails on vessels so built and documented when such contract has been assigned or sublet or when mails covered by such contract are in violation of the terms thereof carried on any vessel not so built and documented. This section shall not be applicable in the case of contracts made under Title IV of the merchant marine act, 1928.'

"(b) Section 7 of the merchant marine act, 1920 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 866), is amended by striking out so much thereof as reads as follows: 'The Postmaster General is authorized, notwithstanding the act entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce," approved March 3, 1891, to contract for the carrying of the mails over such lines at such price as may be agreed upon by the board and the Postmaster General.'

"(c) The act entitled 'An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce,' approved March 3, 1891 (U. S. C., title 39, secs. 657–665), is repealed.

"(d) So much of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1917, as provides for contracts for the carrying of mails between the United States and Great Britain (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 666), is repealed.

"(e) Subdivision (b) of section 4009 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (44 Stat. L., pt. 2, 900), is amended to read as follows:

"'(b) The provisions of subdivision (a) of this section shall not limit the compensation for transportation of mail which the Postmaster General may pay under contracts entered into in accordance with the provisions of section 4007 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 652), section 24 of the merchant marine act, 1920 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 880), or title 4 of the merchant marine act, 1928.'

"(f) Any contract made prior to the enactment of this act shall remain in force and effect in the same manner and to the same extent as though this act had not been enacted. Any such contract which expires on June 30, 1928, may be extended for a period of not more than one year from such date.

"TITLE V—INSURANCE FUND

"SEC. 501. Section 10 of the merchant marine act, 1920 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 869), is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 10. That the board may create out of insurance premiums, and revenue from operations and sales, and maintain and administer separate insurance funds which it may use to insure in whole or in part against all hazards commonly covered by insurance policies in such cases, any legal or equitable interest of the United States (1) in any vessel constructed or in process of construction; and (2) in any plants or property in the possession or under the authority of the board. The United States shall be held to have such an interest in any vessel toward the construction, reconditioning, remodeling, improving, or equipping of which a loan has been made under the authority of this act, in any vessel upon which it holds a mortgage or lien of any character, or in any vessel which is obligated by contract with the owner to perform any service in behalf of the United States, to the extent of the Government's interest therein.'

"TITLE VI—TRANSPORTATION OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS

"SEC. 601. Any officer or employee of the United States traveling on official business overseas to foreign countries, or to any of the possessions of the United States, shall travel and transport his personal effects on ships registered under the laws of the United States when such ships are available, unless the necessity of his mission requires the use of a ship under a foreign flag: Provided, That the Comptroller General of the United States shall not credit any allowance for travel or shipping expenses incurred on a foreign ship in the absence of satisfactory proof of the necessity therefor.

"TITLE VII—MISCELLANEOUS

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 701. The appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act are hereby authorized.

"REQUISITION OF VESSELS

"SEC. 702. (a) The following vessels may be taken and purchased or used by the United States for national defense or during any national emergency declared by proclamation of the President:

"(1) Any vessel in respect of which, under a contract hereafter entered into, a loan is made from the construction loan fund created by section 11 of the merchant marine act, 1920, as amended—at any time until the principal and interest of the loan has been paid; and

"(2) Any vessel in respect of which an ocean mail contract is made under title 4 of this act—at any time during the period for which the contract is made.

"(b) In such event the owner shall be paid the fair actual value of the vessel at the time of taking, or paid the fair compensation for her use based upon such fair actual value; but in neither case shall such fair actual value be enhanced by the causes necessitating the taking. In the case of a vessel taken and used, but not purchased, the vessel shall be restored to the owner in a condition at least as good as when taken, less reasonable wear and tear, or the owner shall be paid an amount for reconditioning sufficient to place the vessel in such condition. The owner shall not be paid for any consequential damages arising from such taking and purchase or use.

"(c) The President shall ascertain the fair compensation for such taking and purchase or use and shall certify to Congress the amount so found by him to be due, for appropriation and payment to the person entitled thereto. If the amount found by the President to be due is unsatisfactory to the person entitled thereto, such person shall be entitled to sue the United States for the amount of such fair compensation and such suit shall be brought in the manner provided by paragraph 20 of section 24 or by section 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, secs. 41, 250).

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 703. (a) When used in this act, and for the purposes of this act only, the words "foreign trade" mean trade between the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the District of Columbia and a foreign country: Provided, however, That the loading or the unloading of cargo, mail, or passengers at any port in any Territory or possession of the United States shall be construed to be foreign trade if the stop at such Territory or possession is an intermediate stop on what would otherwise be a voyage in foreign trade.

"(b) When used in this act the term "citizen of the United States" includes a corporation, partnership, or association only if it is a citizen of the United States within the meaning of section 2 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 802).

"REAFFIRMATION OF POLICY

"SEC. 704. The policy and the primary purpose declared in section 7 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 866), are hereby reaffirmed.

"SHIP OPERATIONS

"SEC. 705. In the allocations of the operations of the ships, the Shipping Board shall distribute them as far as possible and without detriment to the service among the various ports of the country.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill S. 744 submit the following written statement explaining the action agreed upon by the conference committee:

Except for the renumbering of titles and of sections made necessary by the elimination of Title V of the House amendment and by the transferring of section 804 of the House amendment to the end of the bill where it appears as section 706, the changes in the House amendment are few in number, and of them only three are of importance.

These changes are as follows:

1. Paragraph (c) of section 405 of the House amendment provided that on each departure from the United States of a vessel employed in the ocean mail service under the act, three-fourths of the crew, exclusive of licensed officers required by law, and exclusive of the steward's department, should be citizens of the United States. The modification insisted upon by the Senate conferees and to which your House conferees have agreed provides: (1) That all licensed officers of vessels documented under the laws of the United States as now required by law shall be citizens of the United States; (2) that from and after the enactment of this act and for a period of four years, upon each departure of a vessel employed in the ocean mail service under this title, one-half of the crew shall be citizens of the United States; and (3) that thereafter two-thirds of the crew shall be such citizens.

2. In section 406 of the House amendment two additional cities in which advertisements calling for bids for carrying the mails are required were added, Jacksonville on the east coast and Tacoma on the Pacific.

3. In paragraph (b) of section 408 of the House amendment the word "registered" is striken out and the word "documented" is substituted.

4. In section 601 of the House amendment, which now appears as section 501 of the conference draft, the article "a" in the fifth line is eliminated and the word "fund" in the same line is changed to the plural, "funds."

5. Title V, merchant marine naval reserve, of the House amendment, is stricken from the bill.

6. In paragraph (b) of section 803 of the House amendment, which appears in the committee's draft as paragraph (b) of section 703, the words "a person owing allegiance to the United States, and" are stricken out.

FREDERICK R. LEHLBACH,
ARTHUR M. FREE,
EWIN L. DAVIS,
SCHUYLER O. BLAND,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. GUEVARA].

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, before you stands now a man representing 12,000,000 people without country and without flag. It is declared once more by the action of the committee on conference of both Houses on the Senate bill 744, whose report has just been read. In the conference it was agreed that the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. HOUSTON], on page 24, line 18, of the bill and approved by an overwhelming majority in this House, be stricken out, maintaining therefore the present status of the Filipinos as defined in paragraph (c), section 405, of the bill.

I have no complaint to make of this action of the conference committee. The peculiar political situation of the Philippines and the prospective solution of its problem seems to justify the suppression of the amendment.

Thirty years have elapsed since the Filipino people, in the words of President McKinley, were brought within the jurisdiction of this Nation by providential designs. Within that entire period they have been leading a provisional life and enjoying also a provisional political status by decree and design of the United States. Although the Congress of the United States has already declared the purpose of this Nation as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, it is very interesting to call the attention of this House to the fact that it seems humanitarian that while the announced purpose is not executed the Filipino people should enjoy equal treatment before the law. While American citizens can be freely employed in the ships of Philippine registry without any restriction, the Filipinos can not enjoy the same privilege as to ships of American registry.

The Filipinos owe allegiance to the United States Government and they are in duty bound to fight and die for the defense of her flag, which is now the only one floating over their country, and yet they can not serve the ships traveling in both oceans flying the very same flag. In other words, the Filipinos are denied the right to serve the American merchant marine flying the flag for which they are ready to fight and die.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that considering all these circumstances and the situation in which the Filipinos are forced to live, it is high time that the Congress of the United States now take the necessary steps for the final solution of the Philippine problem in accordance with the terms laid down in the Jones Act.

Mr. RATHBONE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. RATHBONE. Do I understand that the gentleman approves the conference report and the changes that were made in the bill after it left the House?

Mr. GUEVARA. I do not approve it, but I have no complaint to make.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have been interested in the statement just made by the Commissioner from the Philippines, and am at a loss to understand the action of the conferees in striking out the Houston amendment as to service of Filipinos in our merchant marine. Would the gentleman from Maine give us an explanation of that action, in view of the statement of commissioners from the Philippines?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, in response to the question, I make this brief statement. The question of this change in existing law was never suggested to the Merchant Marine Committee, was never considered by the committee, and, so far as I know, was never given serious consideration by any Member of the House until the amendment was presented upon the floor. We did not have adequate information before us upon which, as members of the conference committee we dared to predicate action. We had no knowledge, for instance, if this amendment were adopted, as to how many there might be who would be privileged to receive licenses as officers under United States law. There was no information before the conference committee and no information before the House as to how many there might be who would be privileged to receive certificates as able-bodied seamen under this amendment. In other words, it opened up a subject which went far beyond the immediate knowledge of any of those having responsibility with respect to the legislation. Then we felt this. The position that the conferees now have taken on the matter makes no change in the present law whatsoever, in no degree prejudiced the present situation and rights of Filipinos.

The subject is one which deserves consideration, and is one which I hope may be brought at some time to the attention of the committee and to the attention of the House again, so that we may consider it and act upon it as our judgment in the light of knowledge dictates.

Mr. CRAMTON. Am I wrong in my understanding that the section of the pending bill to which the House amendment was offered materially changed the status of Filipinos as to service in the merchant marine?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes; the gentleman is wrong if that is his understanding. The provision to which the amendment was offered did not change in any respect the status with reference to aliens. It is very much a question to my mind whether the amendment was germane to the section to which it was offered.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is pretty late for that now.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes. But that section simply provided that when used in this act the term "citizen" should include a corporation only if it met the test of section 2 of the 1916 law; that a citizen under this act, if a corporation, must meet the test of what constitutes citizenship of a corporation under that section. This amendment of Mr. HOUSTON, as the gentleman will see, is entirely new matter which was not considered at all by the committee.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will not take time longer than to suggest this to the gentleman from Maine: I am not well informed as to all the aspects of the matter, but I do know, as do the conferees, that Filipinos have rendered heretofore, and do render, important military service in behalf of our flag; that they do serve in our merchant marine; and this amendment was to make it clear that they should continue to have that right. What has impressed me this morning I want to commend to the consideration of the gentleman from Maine.

I may say I am not one who is in a hurry to have Filipinos turned over to their own government, but I note that the Commissioner from the Philippines has been quick to seize upon this action of the conferees as something that he can carry back to his people to increase their desire for independence from our Government. I feel that the action of the conferees is a form of suggestion that ought to be corrected at a very early date.

Mr. DAVIS. In the first place, I would like the gentleman from Michigan to hear what I have to say. This merchant marine bill under consideration grants very substantial aid to citizens of the United States in that such citizens are entitled to these loans, and they are entitled to mail contracts.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. DAVIS. Let me make my statement. Then I will be glad to hear the gentleman. Consequently the term "citizen" not only applies to seamen but also owners and operators of vessels that are entitled to aid under this bill; and as we know, residents of some of our island possessions are not even Filipinos, and that provision would open the door wide. Furthermore——

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion there——

Mr. DAVIS. Furthermore, the provision now reported with respect to the citizenship of seamen merely requires an American citizenship of 50 per cent, and that leaves open entirely without any restriction whatever the citizenship of the other 50 per cent. If we required a 100 per cent personnel of Americans on our vessels, I think it would be nothing but proper and fair to have some provision that would admit the citizens of our island possessions. But when we are making as small a requirement of citizenship as we are, it would not be expedient to leave it open so that there might not be continental American citizens among our officers and seamen; and that provision opens up legislation in regard to our island possessions which in my opinion has no place in a bill of this kind, but should be handled and considered on its merits alone.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman from Tennessee will now permit an interruption, the intention of the Houston amendment, well understood here, was not to relate to the entire bill, but only to this matter of the 50 per cent limitation, to classify those Filipinos as Americans instead of foreigners. The conferees, if they felt the language of the Houston amendment was too uncertain and broad, had it entirely in their power, and I think they had full capacity, to modify the amendment so that it would not apply to our financing Filipinos, but only to their service in the merchant marine; and their failure to do so leaves it so that the bill classifies the Filipinos as aliens, whereas it ought to classify them as Americans. And our failure to classify them as Americans and our action in not classifying them as such is seized upon immediately by the astute political mind of the Commissioner from the Philippines as an argument to carry back to his people as a cause of discontent with our rule. We should not have been so unfortunate in our handling of the problem.

Mr. DAVIS. But already the Shipping Board, in manning our vessels, classifies the Filipinos as American citizens, as I understand. We have taken many of them into our Navy as American citizens.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand the provisions which some of us have been opposing here, including the steward's provision, has been eliminated?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes. The modification insisted upon by the Senate conferees and to which your House conferees have agreed provides:

(1) That all licensed officers of vessels documented under the laws of the United States as now required by law shall be citizens of the United States; (2) that from and after the enactment of this act and for a period of four years upon each departure of a vessel employed in the ocean-mail service under this title, one-half of the crew shall be citizens of the United States; and (3) that thereafter two-thirds of the crew shall be such citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine moves the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

SEC. 2. This act shall not apply in respect to the injury or death of (1) a master or member of a crew of any vessel; (2) an employee of a common carrier by railroad when engaged in interstate or foreign commerce or commerce solely within the District of Columbia; (3) an employee subject to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, as amended; and (4) an employee engaged in agriculture, domestic service, or any employment that is casual and not in the usual course of the trade, business, occupation, or profession of the employer.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect July 1, 1928.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

CONVICT-MADE GOODS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 196

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 7729, to divest goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by convicts or prisoners of their interstate character in certain cases. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed three hours, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall arise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is for the consideration of the Hawes-Cooper prison labor bill. I do not think it is necessary to take any special time in explaining the resolution because it simply provides for the consideration of the bill under the general rules of the House with three hours' general debate, but I desire to make a very brief statement with regard to the bill itself.

There have been a great many questions asked as to just what the bill does. My understanding is that the bill simply divests prison-made products of their interstate character on their arrival in the State of their final destination or, in other words, it gives the right to the State in which these goods are to be sold to control the distribution and sale of those goods.

It subjects goods coming from an outside State to the same conditions as prison-made goods in the State itself. It does not call for any additional legislation on the part of any of the individual States. It in no way interferes with each State managing its prison labor as it sees fit. It simply protects the State into which these goods are sent for final sale.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. BUSBY. In the event agricultural products are produced by convict labor, as they are in Mississippi, would such products be subjected to the same State regulations on their arrival in another State as manufactured goods such as clothing, and so forth?

Mr. SNELL. I am frank to say that question has been raised, but I am unable to answer it. I do not believe you could follow agricultural products in that way or in the same way that you could follow a bale of brooms or a bale of overalls or a bale of shirts.

Mr. BUSBY. Looking to the provisions of the bill, then it is the gentleman's opinion that agricultural products could not be followed in detail sufficiently to be regulated by the provisions of this bill, if enacted.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I am told. I do not believe they could be followed and I do not think it is intended to apply in the broadest sense to agricultural products.

Mr. BUSBY. This is an important proposition with respect to my State, and I wanted to get the gentleman's idea about it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the gentleman is in error because the bill states "all goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured, produced, or mined." I do not see how you could escape the provisions of the law.

Mr. SNELL. I do not believe there would be any objection to putting in a provision excepting agricultural products, because you can not follow those products, and I do not understand there is any complaint from that source.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The State of Texas, like the State of Mississippi, uses its convicts in raising agricultural products, and I am wondering if there would be any objection to an amendment clarifying the matter.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to call on the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KOPP], the chairman of the Commitete on Labor, to answer that question, because he is better qualified to answer it than I am.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I may say to the gentleman from Iowa I am asking whether or not there would be any objection on the part of the committee to amending this bill so as to exempt agricultural products. In our State, as well as in some other States, we have no such manufactured goods, but we do have farm products produced by the convicts.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. COOPER of Ohio, the author of the bill, is here, and I shall refer the question to him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The chairman of the Rules Committee referred the question to the chairman of the Labor Committee, and he now refers it to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TUCKER. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. SNELL. One at a time, please.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Texas, I will say that I think we ought to wait a while before we decide this question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have asked the question, so the gentlemen could be considering the matter, and I may say that I would like to see this exception made.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I think we can take that up after we get into committee.

Mr. BUSBY. There seems to be no unanimity of opinion on the proposition.

Mr. SNELL. We have given three hours of general debate for the purpose of settling all these questions.

Mr. TUCKER. I desire to ask the gentleman this question. I never saw this bill until this morning——

Mr. SNELL. It or a similar bill has been before the Congress for 20 years and has passed the House at least three times before this.

Mr. TUCKER. Then it has been my misfortune.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SNELL. I have yielded to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I would like to intersperse this statement. This bill has not passed the Congress three times.

Mr. SNELL. Similar bills have passed the House.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The bill that passed the House prohibited the shipment of such goods in interstate commerce.

Mr. TUCKER. As I read this bill rather hastily, is it merely declaratory of what the law now is?

Mr. SNELL. I can not answer that question.

Mr. TUCKER. Well, I think I can.

Mr. SNELL. I have found out there are good lawyers on both sides of this matter. I am not a lawyer and I am not going to be drawn into this constitutional question.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman from New York permitted a question to be asked of the author of the bill with reference to excepting agricultural products. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he, the chairman of the Rules Committee and the great leader of this House that he is, is in favor of this kind of class legislation.

Mr. SNELL. I am in favor of this bill, I will tell you that without any hesitation. If the gentleman is not, he can produce his argument on the floor.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield for a simple question?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; if I can answer it.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Does this proposed legislation affect any States where at present they have no law on the subject?

Mr. SNELL. No; I understand it does not. It does not interfere with any laws at all of the different States.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. We have not any law in our State.

Mr. SNELL. Then it does not affect you.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. As I understand, this will apply not only to contract-made goods in prisons, but also to any goods that are made in prison by the prison authorities and without any contract with any private person.

Mr. SNELL. There is no distinguishing feature between the two classes of goods, if they are shipped into other States, but applies to each alike.

Mr. NEWTON. So far as the bill is concerned.

Mr. SNELL. None at all.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. HARE. Is this bill designed to prevent the prisoners of a State from making any kind of commodity?

Mr. SNELL. It does not interfere with any prison-made goods at all as long as you keep them within your own State; but if you want to ship them into my State you must comply with the laws of my State. But you can run your own prisons and do anything you want, so long as you keep prison-made goods out of my State or out of any other State that has laws on the subject.

Mr. HARE. Suppose the prisoners of a State are engaged in producing farm crops, like corn——

Mr. SNELL. That question has been asked, and I have stated I can not answer it.

Mr. HARE. I would like for somebody to answer that before I vote to consider the bill, because if there is nobody ready to explain it I want to know it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. A State that does not have a law on this subject might enact such legislation subsequent to the passage of this bill. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that that would prohibit the convict-made goods coming into that State?

Mr. SNELL. It limits those goods to the same conditions that are applicable to goods made in the State's own prison.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It would not prohibit the shipment of the goods?

Mr. SNELL. No; it would limit the sale of them to the same conditions that apply to goods made in that State.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What would be the use of shipping them if they could not be disposed of?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not think Congress has authority to make any law prohibiting the shipment of goods, the shipment of legitimately made goods, through interstate commerce. We are not attempting to do that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It has been privately stated, or at least a rumor is running around, that an amendment is going to be accepted to this bill to exclude from its provisions agricultural products. Whether that rumor is correct or not I do not know.

Mr. SNELL. I will say that it has not reached me yet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If cotton is to be excluded, upon what justification can we continue it on another product? Of cotton there is a tremendous surplus.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, that is a different proposition. Where you put prison labor to the manufacture of overalls—and I use that as an illustration—and dump them all in one State they come into competition with the manufacturer of overalls that employs labor obtained in the open market and pays the market price. Certainly prison-made overalls can be sold much cheaper than the legitimate manufacturer can produce them. There is a very small amount of cotton produced by prison labor.

Mr. COLLIER. What about the raw material?

Mr. SNELL. That is what I am talking about—the raw cotton.

Mr. COLLIER. Suppose convict labor in a State produces several hundred thousand bales of cotton—under the provisions of this bill the cotton could not be shipped to another State?

Mr. SNELL. I have answered that question once, that I did not know. I think that will be fully explained later.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Who objected to the bill?

Mr. SNELL. The objections came from the wardens of the prison, who said that they would have considerable trouble in readjusting the present labor in the prisons, and that was the reason we gave them two years.

Mr. LINTHICUM. They claimed that it would throw their men out of employment and they did not know what they would do with them?

Mr. SNELL. They said it would take some time to readjust conditions, but not necessarily throw them out of employment, and that is the reason we gave them two years to readjust their prison-labor problem.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not true that it was stated that they could readjust their present plant and comply with the new conditions within two years?

Mr. SNELL. That is the statement that I am making. There was nothing said in favor of the contract-labor system by anybody. None of these people had the temerity to come before the committee and present their case, although a large amount of goods is sold through contractors.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Is not this bill an enabling act to enable each State to regulate the sale of prison-made goods, and that it does not prohibit the transportation of prison-made goods?

Mr. MERRITT. Is not the prohibiting of transportation an indirect way of prohibiting the sale of goods?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. This does not prohibit the shipment of goods.

Mr. MERRITT. Does it not prohibit the transportation?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Suppose the State of Connecticut had a law regulating the sale of convict-made goods. It would be manifestly unfair for some other State of the Union to dump millions of dollars' worth of prison-made goods into the State of Connecticut, and the State of Connecticut have no regulation or control over them.

Mr. MERRITT. That would not be any more difficult than dumping any other kind of goods made in any other way.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The only thing this bill seeks to do is to remedy the situation and give each State in the Union the right to regulate the sale of convict-made goods.

Mr. MERRITT. Is it not true that it gives each State in the Union the power to control the practices and regulations of some other States?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not exactly.

Mr. TUCKER. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to state that this is an enabling act?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. TUCKER. To enable what?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Each State in the Union to regulate the sale of prison-made goods.

Mr. TUCKER. Has Congress the right to give such rights to the States?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to yield any further to these constitutional arguments. The rule provides for three hours of general debate. The bill is favored by the manufacturers, by union labor, and by the women's clubs of America. It is an important matter and should receive the careful and considerate attention of this body.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes before the House of Representatives with the best kind of intentions and the highest purposes back of it. It has back of it, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] stated, organized labor, the manufacturers, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, and various prison-reform organizations. It has the backing of organizations that I like to agree with, that every Member of the House likes to agree with. We do not like to find ourselves in disagreement with such organizations.

The proponents of the bill state in their report and otherwise that it is not the purpose of the proposed legislation to force idleness upon the prisoners of the country. In fact, they insist for the welfare of the prisoners and the welfare of society that the prisoners should be kept at some useful labor. Very well. You can not keep prisoners busy at anything, I do not care what it is, unless the products they make come in competition in some way with free labor. Even the janitor work of the prisons could be done by some one else than the prisoners, so gentlemen should get that out of their minds that there is some way to keep prisoners employed without displacing free labor. If you are going to keep the prisoners busy, then the prisoners are going to compete with free labor somewhere, whether the products of their labor are sold within the States only where produced or whether such products are sold in interstate commerce.

The question of farm labor came up before the Committee on Rules. It came up as to whether or not the products produced on these prison farms would come under this bill. There is no question about that. The suggestion was made that we should except agricultural products. That is fine for us from the agricultural sections where we already have an overproduction of agricultural products. Take the prisoners away from making binder twine and automobile tags and shirts, etc., and put them to producing farm products in competition with the farmer! It is absurd for anybody to suggest that this House will accept such an amendment to this bill as that. Everyone who has any regard at all for agriculture and the welfare of agriculture will resist this proposition.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman explain how this bill protecting a few industries against unfair competition will hurt the farmers? If the farmers' customers are thrown out of work, the farmer will thereby suffer.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The suggestion is made to except agricultural products. You are going to prohibit, in effect, prison-made goods in interstate commerce except the products produced on prison farms.

Mr. CARSS. I do not think that they have ever accepted that.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The suggestion was made before the Committee on Rules, and the suggestion again was made seriously here in the House this morning.

The committee report is very misleading in that it says "that prisoners must be employed is one of the principles upon which the bill is founded." The bill is not founded on anything of the kind. There is not a word in the bill which says that the prisoners must be kept busy. Furthermore, the report says that "as a result of the passage of this measure the prisoners of the future will not only be employed, but may be employed in such a way as to bring about, through scientific methods, their possible rehabilitation for reentrance into society." Mr. Speaker, there is not a word in the bill which justifies this statement.

There is another more vital objection to this bill that to my mind is insurmountable. As I said before, I question neither the high purpose nor the good intentions of the proponents of the bill, but lest you did not get it, let me repeat that you can not employ prison labor at anything—I do not care what it is—unless you compete with some form of free labor. There is another mighty force back of this bill, and that is the fact that five States in the Union by their laws have in some way managed to take care of the goods produced in their own penitentiaries by using them in their State and local institutions. I refer to Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois.

The chief question before us is, Can we enact, constitutionally, a bill of this kind? I think it is the duty of every Member as he approaches any proposition coming here to first ask himself whether the proposition to be enacted into law is within the powers conferred by the Constitution on the Congress to legislate upon.

It is said that the bill before us is modeled after the act of August 8, 1890, the Wilson Act, which undertook to make intoxicating liquors subject to State laws upon the arrival of such liquors in those States. One vital difference between that act and the bill before us is the phrase that I shall read to you:

The Wilson Act deals with intoxicating liquors and the phrase in this act to which I refer is "enacted in the exercise of its police power."

I am here to tell you, so far as I have been able to learn, that no laws have been enacted by Congress prohibiting commodities in interstate commerce or making them subject to State laws unless there was something about the commodity itself which was deleterious either to the health or to the morals of the people. The laws heretofore enacted regulated or prohibited interstate commerce in articles of merchandise that were in and of themselves as articles of merchandise injurious and harmful to the users and consumers of them.

Now, there is nothing necessarily injurious in an article produced in a penitentiary; that is, nothing in the article itself. Shirts made in a penitentiary are just like shirts made outside of a penitentiary, and corn and hogs raised on a prison farm are just like corn and hogs raised on any other farm.

Here are some things that Congress has undertaken to regulate or prohibit in interstate commerce:

1. Lottery tickets used for gambling.
2. Obscene literature.
3. Articles designed for indecent or immoral use.
4. Cattle suffering from contagious disease.
5. Impure and adulterated foods and drugs.
6. The transportation of women and girls for immoral purposes under the Mann Act.
7. Firearms and poisons and explosives.

The only articles of commerce which Congress had heretofore made subject to the operation and effect of the laws of the States into which they were shipped are intoxicating liquors under the Wilson Act and Webb-Kenyon Act. If you can prohibit from interstate commerce or prevent the sale in a State—and that, of course, puts them out of interstate commerce—because of the place where they are made or because by whom made, then you can prohibit articles made by Chinamen and Japanese. Suppose the State of Connecticut here had laws to regulate the sale of goods made by Chinamen and Japanese in Connecticut. Then Congress comes along and passes a law to the effect that articles made by Japanese and Chinamen shall be subject to the laws of the State into which they are shipped. You could make the same regulations as to goods made by aliens or by nonunion labor. You have no precedent or constitutional authority for the proposed legislation, and if this bill is constitutional, then you can keep any goods out of interstate commerce if you can get Congress to enact a law to make such goods subject to the laws of the State upon their arrival in that State. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. I have always found that when a lawyer opposes a bill and can not give a very good reason for his opposition, he can always find an excuse by hiding behind a constitutional provision. You can find as many good lawyers supporting the constitutionality of this measure as are opposing it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does not the gentleman concede that it is the duty of Members of Congress to consider the constitutionality of every bill that comes before them, and is it not their duty, when they have formed their opinion that it is unconstitutional, to vote against it upon that ground if upon no other ground?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION BILL

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a minority report to the inland waterways corporation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

THE AGRICULTURAL SURPLUS CONTROL BILL

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 3555), the agricultural surplus control bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the conference report on the bill S. 3555, the agricultural surplus control bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.

The statement was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"DECLARATION OF POLICY

"SECTION 1. In order to stabilize the current of interstate and foreign commerce in the marketing of agricultural commodities and prevent suppression of commerce with foreign nations in such commodities and unjust discrimination against such foreign commerce, it is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress to promote the orderly marketing of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to that end, through the execution of the provisions of this act, to provide for the control and disposition of surpluses of such commodities, to preserve advantageous domestic markets for such commodities, to prevent such surpluses from unduly depressing the prices obtained for such commodities and from causing undue and excessive fluctuations in the markets for such commodities, to minimize speculation and waste in marketing such commodities, and to further the organization of producers of such commodities into cooperative associations.

"FEDERAL FARM BOARD

"SEC. 2. (a) A Federal Farm Board is hereby created which shall consist of the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be a member ex officio, and twelve members, one from each of the twelve Federal land-bank districts, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"(b) The terms of office of the appointed members of the board first taking office after the approval of this Act, shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of nomination, four at the end of the second year, four at the end of the fourth year, and four at the end of the sixth year, after the date of the approval of this act. A successor to an appointed member of the board shall be appointed in the same manner as the original appointed members, and shall have a term of office expiring six years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed.

"(c) Any person appointed to fill a vacancy in the board occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term.

"(d) Any member of the board in office at the expiration of the term for which he was appointed, may continue in office until his successor takes office.

"(e) Vacancies in the board shall not impair the powers of the remaining members to execute the functions of the board, and a majority of the appointed members in office shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of the business of the board.

"(f) Each of the appointed members of the board shall be a citizen of the United States, shall be the producer of some one or more agricultural products or shall be interested in and truly representative of agriculture, shall not actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as a member of the board, and shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year, together with necessary traveling expenses and expenses incurred for subsistence or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law, while away from the principal office of the board on business required by this act, or if assigned to any other office established by the board, then while away from such office on business required by this act.

"GENERAL POWERS

"SEC. 3. The board—

"(a) Shall annually designate an appointed member to act as chairman of the board.

"(b) Shall maintain its principal office in the District of Columbia, and such other offices in the United States as it deems necessary.

"(c) Shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

"(d) Shall make an annual report to Congress.

"(e) May make such regulations as are necessary to execute the functions vested in it by this Act.

"(f) May (1) appoint and fix the salaries of a secretary and such experts, and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923 and subject to the provisions of the civil service laws, such other officers and employees, and (2) make such expenditures (including expenditures for rent and personal services at the seat of government and elsewhere, for law books, periodicals, and books of reference, and for printing and binding) as may be necessary for the execution of the functions vested in the board.

"(g) Shall meet at the call of the chairman, or of the Secretary of Agriculture, or of a majority of its members.

"(h) Shall keep advised, from any available sources, of crop prices, prospects, supply, and demand, at home and abroad, with especial attention to the existence or the probability of the existence of a surplus of any agricultural commodity or any of its food products, and it may advise producers through their organizations or otherwise in matters connected with the adjustment of production, distribution, and marketing of any such commodity, in order that they may secure the maximum benefits under this act.

"(i) Shall advise producers through their organizations or otherwise in the development of suitable programs of planting or breeding, so that burdensome crop surpluses may be avoided or minimized, in order that they may secure such benefits.

"COMMODITY ADVISORY COUNCILS

"SEC. 4. (a) Prior to the commencement of a marketing period in respect of any agricultural commodity the board is directed to create for such commodity an advisory council, which shall be a governmental agency composed of seven members fairly representative of the producers of such commodity. Members of each commodity advisory council shall be selected annually by the board only from lists submitted by the cooperative associations and by other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity in each State that produced in the preceding five crop years, according to the estimates of the United States Department of Agriculture, an average of three per cent or more of the average anuual total domestic production of the commodity, and from lists submitted by the governors and by the heads of the agricultural departments of such States. Members of each commodity advisory council shall serve without salary but may be paid by the board a per diem compensation not exceeding $20 for attending meetings of the council and for time devoted to other business of the council and authorized by the board. Each council member shall be paid by the board his necessary traveling expenses to and from meetings of the council and his expenses incurred for subsistence, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law, while engaged upon the business of the council. Each commodity advisory council shall be designated by the name of the commodity it represents, as, for example, 'The Cotton Advisory Council.'

"(b) Each commodity advisory council shall meet as soon as practicable after its selection at a time and place designated by the board and select a chairman. The board may designate a secretary of the council, subject to the approval of the council.

"(c) Each commodity advisory council shall meet thereafter at least twice in each year at a time and place designated by the board, or upon call of a majority of its members at a time and place designated in the call, notice of such call being sent by registered mail at least 10 days before the date of the meeting.

"(d) Each commodity advisory council shall have power, by itself or through its officers, (1) to confer directly with the board, to call for information from it, or to make oral or written representations to it, concerning matters within the jurisdiction of the board and relating to the agricultural commodity, including the amount and method of collection of the equalization fee, and (2) to cooperate with the board in advising the producers through their organizations or otherwise in the development of suitable programs of planting or breeding so that burdensome crop surpluses may be avoided or minimized, in order to secure the maximum benefits under this act.

"(e) Prior to the commencement or termination of a marketing period with respect to any agricultural commodity and prior to the publication of the amount of any equalization fee with respect to any agricultural commodity, the board shall submit to the advisory council for the commodity a statement of the respective findings or estimate which the board is required to make and of the evidence and facts considered by the board in making such findings or estimate. Within 15 days after receiving such statement, the advisory council shall consider such findings or estimate and shall notify the board of its determination made with respect thereto. No marketing period with respect to any agricultural commodity shall be commenced or terminated and no equalization fee with respect to the commodity shall be collected, unless the advisory council for such commodity has determined (1) that the findings or estimate which the board is required to make are supported by the evidence and facts considered by the board, and (2) that the board has considered substantially all the material facts and evidence available for making the findings or estimate.

"LOANS

"SEC. 5. (a) The board is authorized to make loans, out of the revolving fund hereinafter created, to any cooperative association or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations, upon such terms and conditions as, in the judgment of the board, will afford adequate assurance of repayment and carry out the policy declared in section 1, and upon such other terms and conditions as the board deems necessary. Such loans shall be for one of the following purposes:

"(1) For the purpose of assisting the cooperative association or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations, in controlling a seasonal or year's total surplus, produced in the United States and either local or national in extent, that is in excess of the requirements for the orderly marketing of any agricultural commodity or in excess of the domestic requirements for such commodity.

"(2) For the purpose of developing continuity of cooperative services from the point of production to and including the point of terminal marketing services, if the proceeds of the loan are to be used either (A) for working capital for the cooperative association or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations, or (B) for assisting the cooperative association or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations, in the acquisition, by purchase, construction, or otherwise, of facilities and equipment, including terminal marketing facilities and equipment, for the preparing, handling, storing, processing, or sale or other disposition of agricultural commodities, or (C) for furnishing funds to the cooperative association or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations for use as capital for any agricultural credit corporation eligible to receive discounts under section 202 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended, or (D) for furnishing funds to the cooperative association or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations for necessary expenditures in federating, consolidating, merging, or extending the membership of cooperative associations or corporations created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations. The cooperative association, or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations, shall repay the loan, together with the interest thereon, within a period of not more than 20 years, by means of a charge to be deducted from the proceeds of the sale or other disposition of each unit of the agricultural commodity handled by the association or corporation, unless some other method of repayment is agreed upon by the board and the association or corporation.

"(b) Any loan under this section shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum. The aggregate amount of loans under this section, outstanding and unpaid at any one time, shall not exceed $200,000,000, but—

"(1) The aggregate amount of loans for all purposes under paragraph (2) of subdivision (a), outstanding and unpaid at any one time, shall not exceed $25,000,000; and

"(2) The aggregate amount of loans for the purpose of expenditures in federating, consolidating, merging, or extending the membership of cooperative associations or corporations created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations, outstanding and unpaid at any one time, shall not exceed $1,000,000.

"INCREASED PRODUCTION

"SEC. 6. If the board finds that its advice as to a program of planting or breeding of any agricultural commodity as hereinbefore provided has been substantially disregarded by the producers of the commodity, or that the planting or breeding of any agricultural commodity for any year is substantially greater than a normal increase, as determined by the board, over the average planting or breeding of such commodity or the preceding 5 years, the board may refuse to make loans for the purchase of such commodity.

"CLEARING HOUSE AND TERMINAL MARKET ASSOCIATIONS

"SEC. 7. The board may assist in the establishment of and provide for the registration of, in accordance with such regulations as it may prescribe, (1) clearing-house associations adapted, in the opinion of the board, to effect the more orderly production, distribution, and marketing of any agricultural commodity, to prevent gluts or famines in any market for such commodity, and to reduce waste incident to the marketing of such commodity, and (2) terminal market associations adapted, in the opinion of the board, to maintain public markets in distribution centers for the more orderly distribution and marketing of any agricultural commodity. Only cooperative associations or corporations created or controlled by one or more cooperative associations shall be eligible for membership in any clearing-house association or terminal market association registered under this section. Rules for the governance of any such association shall be adopted by the members thereof with the approval of the board.

"MARKETING AGREEMENTS

"SEC. 8. (a) From time to time upon request of the advisory council for any agricultural commodity, or upon request of leading cooperative associations or other organizations of producers of any agricultural commodity, or upon its own motion, the board shall investigate the supply and marketing situation in respect of such agricultural commodity.

"(b) Whenever upon such investigation the board finds—

"First. That there is or may be during the ensuing year a seasonal or year's total surplus, produced in the United States and national in extent, that is in excess of the requirements for the orderly marketing of any agricultural commodity or in excess of the domestic requirements for the commodity;

"Second. That the operation of the provisions of section 5 (relating to loans to cooperative associations or corporations created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations) will not be effective to control such surplus because of the inability or unwillingness of the cooperative associations engaged in handling the commodity, or corporations created and controlled by one or more such cooperative associations, to control such surplus with the assistance of such loans; and

"Third. That the durability, the conditions of preparation, processing, and preserving, and the methods of marketing of the commodity are such that the commodity is adapted to marketing as authorized by this section;—

then the board, after publicly declaring its findings, shall arrange for marketing any part of the commodity by means of marketing agreements with cooperative associations engaged in handling the commodity or corporations created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations. Such marketing shall continue during a marketing period which shall terminate at such time as the board finds that such arrangements are no longer necessary or advisable for carrying out the policy declared by section 1.

"(c) A marketing agreement shall provide either—

"(1) For the withholding by a cooperative association, or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations, during such period as shall be provided in the agreement, of any part of the commodity delivered to such cooperative association or associations by its members. Any such agreement shall provide for the payment from the stabilization fund for the commodity of the costs arising out of such withholding; or

"(2) For the purchase by a cooperative association, or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations, of any part of the commodity not delivered to such cooperative association or associations by its members, and for the withholding and disposal of the commodity so purchased. Any such marketing agreement shall provide for the payment from the stabilization fund for the commodity of the amount of the losses, costs, and charges arising out of the purchase, withholding, and disposal, or out of contracts therefor, and for the payment into the stabilization fund for the commodity of profits (after repaying all advances from the stabilization fund and deducting all costs and charges, provided for in the agreement) arising out of the purchase, withholding, and disposal, or out of contracts therefor.

"(d) The board may, in its discretion, provide in any such marketing agreement for financing any withholding, purchase, or disposal under such agreement, through advances from the stabilization found for the commodity. Such financing shall be upon such terms as the board may prescribe, but no such advance shall bear interest.

"(e) If the board is of the opinion that there are two or more cooperative associations or corporations created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations capable of carrying out any marketing agreement, the board in entering into the agreement shall not unreasonably discriminate against any such association or corporation in favor of any other such association or corporation. If the board is of the opinion that there is no such cooperative association or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations capable of carrying out any marketing agreement for purchase, withholding, and disposal, then the board may enter into the agreement with other agencies but shall not unreasonably discriminate between such other agencies.

"(f) During a marketing period fixed by the board for any commodity, the board may enter into marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of the food products of such commodity, and all provisions of this section applicable to marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of the commodity, shall apply to the agreements in respect of its food products.

"(g) Any decision of the board relating to the commencement, extension, or termination of a marketing period shall require the affirmative vote of a majority of the appointed members in office.

"(h) The powers of the board under this section in respect of any agricultural commodity shall be exercised in such manner, and the marketing agreements entered into by the board during any marketing period shall be upon such terms, as will, in the judgment of the board, carry out the policy declared by section 1.

"(i) The United States shall not be liable, directly or indirectly, upon agreements under this act in respect of agricultural commodities, in excess of the amounts available in the stabilization, premium insurance, and revolving funds.

"EQUALIZATION FEE

"SEC. 9. (a) In order to carry out marketing and nonpremium insurance agreements in respect of any agricultural commodity without loss to the revolving fund, each marketed unit of such agricultural commodity produced in the United States shall, throughout any marketing period in respect of such commodity, contribute ratably its equitable share of the losses, costs, and charges arising out of such agreements. Such contributions shall be made by means of an equalization fee apportioned and paid as a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce in the commodity. It shall be the duty of the board to apportion and collect such fee in respect of such commodity as hereinafter provided.

"(b) Prior to the commencement of any marketing period in respect of any agricultural commodity, and thereafter from time to time during such marketing period, the board shall estimate the probable losses, costs, and charges to be paid under marketing agreements in respect of such commodity and under nonpremium insurance agreements in respect of such commodity as hereinafter provided. Upon the basis of such estimates, the board shall from time to time determine and publish the amount of the equalization fee (if any is required under such estimates) for each unit of weight, measure, or value designated by the board, to be collected upon such unit of such agricultural commodity during any part of the marketing period for the commodity. Such amount is referred to in this Act as the 'equalization fee.' At the time of determining and publishing any equalization fee the board shall specify the time during which the particular fee shall remain in effect and the place and manner of its payment and collection.

"(c) Under such regulations as the board may prescribe, any equalization fee determined upon by the board shall be paid, in respect of each marketed unit of such commodity, upon one of the following: The transportation, processing, or sale of such unit. The equalization fee shall not be collected more than once in respect of any unit. The board shall determine, in the case of each class of transactions in the commodity, whether the equalization fee shall be paid upon transportation, processing, or sale. The board shall make such determination upon the basis of the most effective and economical means of collecting the fee with respect to each unit of the commodity marketed during the marketing period.

"(d) When any equalization fee is collected with respect to cattle or swine, an equalization fee equivalent in amount, as nearly as may be, shall be collected, under such regulations as the board may prescribe, upon the first sale or other disposition of any food product derived in whole or in part from cattle or swine, respectively, if the food product was on hand and owned at the time of the commencement of the marketing period: Provided, That any food product owned in good faith by retail dealers at the time of the commencement of the marketing period shall be exempt from the operation of this subdivision.

"(e) Under such regulations as the board may prescribe, the equalization fee determined under this section for any agricultural commodity produced in the United States shall in addition be collected upon the importation of each designated unit of the agricultural commodity imported into the United States for consumption therein, and an equalization fee, in an amount equivalent as nearly as may be, shall be collected upon the importation of any food product derived in whole or in part from the agricultural commodity and imported into the United States for consumption therein.

"(f) The board may by regulation require any person engaged in the transportation, processing, or acquisition by purchase of any agricultural commodity produced in the United States, or in the importation of any agricultural commodity or food product thereof—

"(1) To file returns under oath and to report, in respect of his transportation, processing, or acquisition of such commodity produced in the United States or in respect of his importation of the commodity or food product thereof, the amount of equalization fees payable thereon and such other facts as may be necessary for their payment or collection.

"(2) To collect the equalization fee as directed by the board and to account therefor.

"(g) The board, under regulations prescribed by it, is authorized to pay to any such person required to collect such fees a reasonable charge for his services.

"(h) Every person who, in violation of the regulations prescribed by the board, fails to collect or account for any equalization fee shall be liable for its amount and to a penalty equal to one-half its amount. Such amount and penalty may be recovered together in a civil suit brought by the board in the name of the United States.

"(i) As used in this section—

"(1) In the case of grain the term 'processing' means milling of grain for market or the first processing in any manner for market (other than cleaning or drying) of grain not so milled, and the term 'sale' means a sale or other disposition in the United States of grain for milling or other processing for market, for resale, or for delivery by a common carrier—occurring during a marketing period in respect of grain.

"(2) In the case of cotton the term 'processing' means spinning, milling, or any manufacturing of cotton other than ginning; the term 'sale' means a sale or other disposition in the United States of cotton for spinning, milling, or any manufacturing other than ginning, or for delivery outside the United States; and the term 'transportation' means the acceptance of cotton by a common carrier for delivery to any person for spinning, milling, or any manufacturing of cotton other than ginning, or for delivery outside the United States—occurring during a marketing period in respect of cotton.

"(3) In the case of livestock, the term 'processing' means slaughter for market by a purchaser of livestock, and the term 'sale' means a sale or other disposition in the United States of livestock destined for slaughter for market without intervening holding for feeding (other than feeding in transit) or fattening—occurring during a marketing period in respect of livestock.

"(4) In the case of tobacco, the term 'sale' means a sale or other disposition to any dealer in leaf tobacco or to any registered manufacturer of the products of tobacco. The term 'tobacco' means leaf tobacco, stemmed or unstemmed.

"(5) In the case of grain, livestock, and tobacco, the term 'transportation' means the acceptance of the commodity by a common carrier for delivery.

"(6) In the case of any agricultural commodity other than grain, cotton, livestock, or tobacco, the board shall, in connection with its specification of the place and manner of payment and collection of the equalization fee, further specify the particular type of processing, sale, or transportation in respect of which the equalization fee is to be paid and collected.

"(7) The term 'sale' does not include a transfer to a cooperative association for the purpose of sale or other disposition by such association on account of the transferor; nor a transfer of title in pursuance of a contract entered into before, and at a specified price determined before, the commencement of a marketing period in respect of the agricultural commodity. In case of the transfer of title in pursuance of a contract entered into after the commencement of a marketing period in respect of the agricultural commodity, but entered into at a time when, and at a specified price determined at a time during which a particular equalization fee is in effect, then the equalization fee applicable in respect of such transfer of title shall be the equalization fee in effect at the time when such specified price was determined.

"STABILIZATION FUNDS

"SEC. 10. (a) For each agricultural commodity as to which marketing agreements are made by the board there shall be established, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the board, a stabilization fund. Such fund shall be administered by and exclusively under the control of the board, and the board shall have the exclusive power of expending the moneys in such fund.

"(b) There shall be deposited to the credit of the stabilization fund for any agricultural commodity (1) advances from the revolving fund as hereinafter authorized, (2) profits arising out of marketing agreements in respect of the commodity, (3) repayments of advances for financing the purchase, withholding, or disposal of the commodity, and (4) equalization fees collected in respect of the commodity and its imported food products.

"(c) In order to make the payments required by a marketing or nonpremium insurance agreement in respect of any agricultural commodity, and in order to pay the salaries and expenses of experts, the board may, in its discretion, advance to the stabilization fund for such commodity out of the revolving fund such amounts as may be necessary.

"(d) The deposits to the credit of a stabilization fund shall be made in a public depositary of the United States. All general laws relating to the embezzlement, conversion, or to the improper handling, retention, use, or disposal of public moneys of the United States shall apply to the profits and equalization fees payable to the credit of the stabilization fund and to moneys deposited to the credit of the fund or withdrawn therefrom but in the custody of any officer or employee of the United States.

"(e) There shall be withdrawn from the stabilization fund for any agricultural commodity (1) the payments required by marketing or nonpremium insurance agreements in respect of the commodity, (2) the salaries and expenses of such experts as the board determines shall be payable from such fund, (3) repayments into the revolving fund of advances made from the revolving fund to the stabilization fund, together with interest on such amounts at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, and (4) service charges payable for the collection of equalization fees.

"INSURANCE

"SEC. 11. (a) In order that a cooperative association handling any staple agricultural commodity may with reasonable security make payments to its members at the time of delivery of such commodity by the members, fairly reflecting the current market value of such agricultural commodity, the board is authorized to enter into an agreement, upon such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, for the insurance of such cooperative association against price decline as hereinafter provided. Such insurance agreement may be entered into by the board only with respect to any such agricultural commodity which, in the judgment of the board, is regularly traded in upon an exchange in sufficient volume to establish a recognized basic price for the market grades of such commodity, and then only when such exchange has accurate price records for the commodity covering a period of years of sufficient length, in the judgment of the board, to serve as a basis upon which to calculate the risks of the insurance.

"(b) Any such agreement for insurance against price decline shall provide for the insurance of the cooperative association for any twelve months' period commencing with the delivery season for the commodity against loss to such association or its members due to decline in the average market price for the commodity during the time of sale by the association from the average market price for the commodity during the time of delivery to the association. The measure of such decline, where a decline occurs, shall be the difference between the average market price weighted for the days and volume of delivery to the association by its members, and the average market price weighted for the days and volume of sales by the association. In computing such average market prices the board shall use the daily average cash prices paid for the basic grade of such commodity in the exchange designated in the agreement. Any such agreement shall cover only so much of the commodity delivered to the association as is produced by the members of the association and as is reported by the association for coverage under the agreement.

"(c) Whenever in the judgment of the board the use of such insurance agreements in respect of any commodity will stabilize the market substantially in the interest of the producers of the commodity whether or not members of a cooperative association dealing in the commodity, then the board, during the continuance of any marketing period for the commodity as provided in section 8, may enter into nonpremium, or if the board deems it advisable, premium insurance agreements with cooperative associations dealing in the commodity. Whenever in the judgment of the board the use of such insurance agreements will not so stabilize the market, then the board may enter into premium insurance agreements only with the cooperative associations.

"(d) Payments required under nonpremium insurance agreements in respect of any commodity shall be made out of the stabilization fund for the commodity. Payments under premium insurance agreements in respect of any commodity shall be made out of the premium insurance fund for the commodity to be established by the board under such regulations as it may prescribe.

"(e) For insurance under a premium insurance agreement the cooperative association shall pay a premium, to be determined by the board prior to the making of the insurance agreement, upon each unit of the commodity reported by the association for coverage under the insurance agreement. Such premium shall be calculated with due regard to the past price records in established markets for the commodity. The premiums applicable to the commodity in the successive twelve months' periods shall be adjusted with due regard to the experience of the board under preceding insurance agreements. There shall be deposited in the premium insurance fund for any commodity the premiums paid by cooperative associations under premium insurance agreements in respect of the commodity, and advances from the revolving fund in such amounts as the board deems necessary for the operation of the fund. There shall be disbursed from the premium insurance fund for any commodity (1) the payments required by any premium insurance agreement in respect of the commodity, and (2) repayments into the revolving fund of advances made from the revolving fund to such premium insurance fund, together with interest on such advances at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

"REVOLVING FUND

"SEC. 12 (a). There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $400,000,000: Provided, That at least $200,000,000 of such sum shall be made available by the board solely for use in making advances to the stabilization funds for agricultural commodities in respect of which marketing periods are commenced; and in the allocation of such amount among the stabilization funds of the several commodities, the board shall take into consideration the values of the respective commodities.

"(b) All moneys appropriated in pursuance of the authorization made by this section shall be administered by the board and used as a revolving fund in accordance with the provisions of this Act. The Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in the revolving fund such portions of the amounts appropriated therefor as the board from time to time deems necessary.

"EXAMINATIONS OF BOOKS AND ACCOUNTS OF BOARD

"SEC. 13. Expenditures by the board from the stabilization or premium insurance funds shall be made by the authorized officers or agents of the board upon receipt of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by such officers as the board may designate. All other expenditures by the board, including expenditures for loans and advances from the revolving fund, shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the chairman of the board. Vouchers so made for expenditures from the revolving fund or from any stabilization or premium insurance fund shall be final and conclusive upon all officers of the Government; except that all financial transactions of the board (including the payments required by any marketing or insurance agreement) shall, subject to the above limitations, be examined by the General Accounting Office, at such times and in such manner as the Comptroller General of the United States may by regulation prescribe. Such examination in respect of expenditures from the revolving fund or from any stabilization or premium insurance fund shall be for the sole purpose of making a report to the Congress and to the board of expenditures and agreements in violation of law, together with such recommendations as the Comptroller General deems advisable concerning the receipts, disbursements, and application of the funds administered by the board.

"COOPERATION WITH EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

"SEC. 14. (a) It shall be the duty of any governmental establishment in the executive branch of the Government, upon request by the board, or upon Executive order, to cooperate with and render assistance to the board in carrying out any of the provisions of this act and the regulations of the board. The board shall, in cooperation with any such governmental establishment, avail itself of the services and facilities of such governmental establishment in order to avoid preventable expense or duplication of effort.

"(b) Upon request by the board the President, by Executive order, (1) may transfer any officer or employee from any department or independent establishment in the executive branch of the Government, irrespective of his length of service in such department or independent establishment, to the service of the board, and (2) may direct any governmental establishment to furnish the board with such information and data pertaining to the functions of the board as may be contained in the records of the governmental establishment; except that the President shall not direct that the board be furnished with any information or data supplied by any person in confidence to any governmental establishment, in pursuance of any provision of law or of any agreement with the governmental establishment.

"(c) The board may cooperate with any State or Territory, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or with any person.

"GENERAL DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 15. (a) As used in this act—

"(1) The term 'person' means individual, partnership, corporation, or association.

"(2) The term 'United States,' when used in a geographical sense, means continental United States and the Territory of Hawaii.

"(3) The term 'cooperative association' means an association of persons engaged in the production of agricultural products, as farmers, planters, ranchers, dairymen, or nut or fruit growers, organized to carry out any purpose specified in section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products,' approved February 18, 1922, if such association is qualified under such act.

"(b) The provisions of sections 8, 9, and 10 shall not apply to perishable fruits and vegetables.

"(c) Whenever any agricultural commodity has regional or market classifications or types which in the judgment of the board are so different from each other in use or marketing methods as to require their treatment as separate commodities under this act, the board may determine upon and designate one or more such classifications or types for such treatment.

"ADMINISTRATIVE APPROPRIATION

"SEC. 16. For expenses in the administration of the functions vested in the board by this act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, to be available to the board for such expenses (including salaries and expenses of the members, officers, and employees of the board and the per diem compensation and expenses of members of the commodity advisory councils) incurred prior to July 1, 1929.

"SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

"SEC. 17. If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional or the applicability thereof to any person, circumstance, commodity, or class of transactions in respect of any commodity, is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the applicability of such provision to other persons, circumstances, commodities, and classes of transactions shall not be affected thereby.

"COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS ACT

"SEC. 18. (a) Nothing in this act is intended or shall be construed to repeal or modify any provision of the act entitled 'An act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products,' approved February 18, 1922.

"PENALTIES

"SEC. 19. (a) The provisions of sections 123 and 124 of the Penal Code, approved March 4, 1909, as amended, shall apply to any member, officer, or employee of the board; and, in addition, it shall be held a violation of section 123 of such code if any member, officer, or employee of the board at any time speculates, directly or indirectly, in any agricultural commodity.

"(b) It shall be unlawful (1) for any cooperative association, or corporation created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations or other agency if such agency is acting for or on behalf of the board under any marketing agreement, or (2) for any director, officer, or employee of any such association, corporation, or agency, to which information has been imparted in confidence by the board, to disclose such information in violation of any regulation of the board. Any such association, corporation, or agency, or director, officer, or employee thereof, violating any provision of this subdivision, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendment struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause. The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, with an amendment which is a substitute for both the Senate bill and the House amendment. The essential differences between the Senate bill and the House amendment, and the nature of the corresponding provisions of the substitute agreed upon by the conferees, are set forth in the following discussion:

1. Qualifications of board members: The Senate bill required that a member of the board must be either a producer of some one or more agricultural products, or interested in and truly representative of agriculture. The House amendment contained no such requirement. The substitute adopts the provision in the Senate bill.

2. Adjustment of production: The Senate bill directed the board to advise producers in the development of suitable programs of planting or breeding in order that the maximum benefits under the bill might be realized. It also authorized the board to refuse to commence a marketing period, or to terminate an existing marketing period on 12 months' notice, in case producers substantially disregarded the advice of the board as to a suitable program of planting or breeding, or in case of a substantial increase in planting or breeding over the preceding five-year average.

The House amendment contained the same provision for advice as to a suitable program of planting or breeding, but stated the purpose of such advice to be in order that burdensome crop surpluses might be avoided or minimized. The House amendment also provided for advice to producers on all matters connected with the adjustment of production, and further authorized the board to refuse to make loans to cooperative associations for the purchase of crop surpluses in case producers substantially disregarded the advice of the board or substantially increased the planting or breeding of any commodity above the average for the preceding five years.

The substitute retains the provision of the Senate bill and the House amendment for advice as to a suitable program of planting or breeding, adding thereto the House statement of the object sought; i. e., so that burdensome crop surpluses might be avoided or minimized. The House provision for advice on matters relating to the adjustment of production also is adopted in the substitute. The substitute further retains the provision authorizing refusal to make loans in the event of abnormally increased production that appeared in the House amendment, while the provision in the Senate bill authorizing the board under such conditions to refuse to make marketing agreements is omitted. The substitute stresses the influence which the board can exercise through advice and leadership in the development of a sound program of planting and breeding, and recognizes that in the case of marketing agreements under which the cost of organized handling of the surplus would be borne by all the producers through equalization fees, the equalization fees themselves would automatically reflect upon the producers the penalties of an abnormally increased surplus, thus making unnecessary the omitted Senate provision.

3. Organization of advisory councils: The Senate bill provided that whenever the board was organized or whenever it determined that any agricultural commodity might require stabilization through marketing agreements or whenever the cooperative associations or other organizations representative of producers of the commodity applied to the board, then the board should constitute an advisory council. It was further provided that the council should be a private agency of seven members elected annually by the cooperative associations or other farm organizations representative of the commodity.

The House amendment provided that an advisory council for an agricultural commodity should be created prior to the commencement of a marketing period for such commodity. Under the House amendment the advisory council was composed of seven members fairly representative of the producers of the commodity and selected by the board. In making its selections the board was restricted to nominees in lists submitted by (1) cooperative associations, (2) other organizations representing the producers of the commodity, (3) governors, and (4) heads of agricultural departments in States where the commodity is produced.

The substitute retains the provisions of the House bill with amendments making it clear that the advisory councils are governmental and not private agencies and that the cooperative associations, other organizations, governors, and heads of agricultural departments need not submit a joint list of nominees but may submit separate lists. Only cooperative associations, other organizations, governors, and heads of agricultural departments of States that during the preceding five crop years, according to the estimates of the United States Department of Agriculture, produced an average of 3 per cent or more of the average annual total domestic productions of the commodity, are, under the substitute, entitled to submit such lists. This restriction confines the submission of lists to those States which are the principal producers of the commodity.

Under the substitute, members of the advisory council are paid a per diem compensation from Treasury appropriations, and the councils are governmental and not private agencies and exercise no executive powers or functions in connection with the enforcement of the law, but merely, as hereinafter set forth, act as agents of the Congress, in conjunction with the board, to ascertain the existence of the contingencies of fact upon which marketing periods are to commence or terminate and upon which estimates for equalization fees are to be based.

4. Concurrent action of advisory councils: The Senate bill contained several provisions requiring the approval or concurrence of the advisory council for a particular commodity before any action of the board with regard to that commodity would be effective. Thus, the Senate bill provided that the advisory council must concur in the findings of the board before a marketing period could be commenced or terminated, and must concur in the estimate upon which the equalization fee was based before the fee could be collected. Again, the Senate bill contained duplicate provisions requiring the concurrence of the advisory council in the findings of the board as to termination of the marketing period, the approval by the advisory council of any decision of the board relating to the commencement or termination of the marketing period, and the concurrence of the advisory council in the estimate upon which the equalization fee is based. Finally, the Senate bill provided that all actions of the board having exclusive application to an agricultural commodity were subject to the approval of the advisory council. This last provision would apparently cover not only commencement and termination of marketing periods and collection of equalization fees but also the making of individual loans or individual insurance contracts, the payments of losses, costs, and charges upon marketing agreements, the obtaining of advances from the revolving fund for use of the stabilization funds or insurance funds, the repayment of such advances, the appointment of experts, and the making of regulations with regard to particular commodities, and a great number of minor matters.

The House amendment in but a single provision set forth that a marketing period could not be commenced or terminated, and that an equalization fee could not be collected unless the advisory council determined that the findings of the board in connection with the commencement or termination of the marketing period or the estimate of the board in connection with the determination of the amount of the equalization fee were supported by the evidence and facts considered by the board, and that substantially all the material facts and evidence available were considered by the board.

The House amendment thus vested the advisory council with power, to be exercised concurrently with the power of the board, to examine the facts upon which the board's decision to commence or terminate a marketing period is based, or to approve the estimates which form the basis for determining the amount of equalization fees. Substantially the same delegation of power as to findings of fact is made to both governmental agencies, and their joint agreement is required as to the presence of certain prescribed conditions before part of the legislative power exercised in the bill becomes effective. The procedure by which the advisory council reaches its determination in these matters is set forth in the House amendment in some detail. After the board makes its determination as to the particular findings or estimate, it is required to submit a statement thereof to the appropriate advisory council. The advisory council must act within 15 days after receiving such statement. The advisory council in its determination is confined to the record built up by the board as a basis for its finding or estimate and can not act arbitrarily or capriciously. It can not reach a determination contrary to that of the board unless it finds that the board's determination is not supported by the evidence and facts in the board's record. An exception is made in the event that the advisory council determines that the board has failed to consider substantially all the material facts and evidence available; in other words, that its record was incomplete in substantial particulars and lacked material facts and evidence. In that event the determination of the advisory council would fail to accord with the determination of the board, and the board would be notified in what respect such record was lacking, and would then have to reach a new determination upon the basis of a completed record.

The House amendment sets forth a clearly intelligible principle to which the advisory councils must conform and a clearly intelligible procedure through which they must act—all in such detail as to avoid any possibility of an improper delegation of legislative power to the advisory councils. The advisory councils act in conjunction with the board as the agents of Congress to ascertain and declare the existence of the contingencies upon which its expressed will is to take effect.

The substitute retains the House provisions in lieu of the Senate provisions.

5. Loans to cooperative associations: The Senate bill provided for loans only to cooperative associations, in an aggregate amount not to exceed $250,000,000, for the following purposes: (a) To assist cooperative associations in controlling the surplus of any agricultural commodity; (b) to assist cooperative associations in acquiring facilities for preparing, handling, storing, or processing agricultural commodities; and (c) to provide cooperative associations with funds to be used as capital for agricultural credit corporations. Loans for the purposes here set forth under (b) and (c) were limited in the aggregate to $25,000,000.

The House amendment authorized loans not only to cooperative associations but also to corporations created and controlled by them. The aggregate amount of all loans was limited in the House amendment to $400,000,000. The House amendment authorized such loans not only for the purposes specified in the Senate bill but for the following additional purposes: (a) To provide cooperative associations or corporations created and controlled by them with working capital, and (b) to furnish such associations or corporations with funds for necessary expenditures in consolidating, federating, or extending their membership. Under the House amendment loans for the latter purpose were limited in the aggregate to $2,000,000.

The House amendment specified that loans must be on such terms as would afford adequate assurance of repayment and carry out the policy declared in section 1. It further specified that loans for purposes other than to assist in controlling surpluses, might be secured by members' marketing contracts, and repaid within 20 years by means of a charge deducted from deliveries under members' marketing contracts.

The House amendment also sets forth in detail the conditions to which a corporation created and controlled by cooperative associations must conform in order to be eligible for loans. Its by-laws were required to be satisfactory to the board and to insure continued control by cooperative associations. Its records and accounts were required to be kept as prescribed by the board. The board was authorized to investigate its financial condition and business methods, and there were provisions for reserve funds and patronage dividends.

The substitute contains the House provision for loans to corporations created and controlled by cooperative associations, as well as to cooperative associations themselves, but omits the detailed statement of conditions to which such corporations must conform in order to be eligible for loans. These detailed provisions are not included in the substitute for the reason that the board is given the general power to prescribe terms and conditions under which loans are to be made, and thus has abundant authority to require satisfactory by-laws, satisfactory proof of cooperative control, and accounting and business methods acceptable to the board, as well as to reserve the right to examine the financial condition and business methods of any borrowing corporation if it should become necessary.

The aggregate limit on all loans is fixed in the substitute in conformity with the two Senate provisions which made $200,000,000 of the revolving fund available for stabilization funds and limited loans in the aggregate to $250,000,000, except that in the substitute what appears to be an inconsistency in the amounts of the two Senate allotments totaling $450,000,000 out of a revolving fund of $400,000,000, is avoided by the fixing of the aggregate amount of all loans at $200,000,000.

The substitute incorporates also the authorization of loans for working capital, and to assist in consolidating or extending the membership of cooperative associations or corporations created by them, except that the limit on loans for the latter purpose is fixed at $1,000,000 instead of $2,000,000 as in the House amendment.

The provision in the Senate bill for the amortized repayment of loans is adopted in the substitute instead of the House provision, thus avoiding any implication that such loans were intended primarily for cooperative associations having members' marketing contracts. The substitute also adopts the language that was used in the House amendment as to the terms and conditions on which loans might be made, requiring adequate assurance of repayment, and conformity to the policy declared in section 1, in the case of each loan. The substitute places the same limit on the aggregate amount of loans (other than loans to assist in controlling surpluses) at $25,000,000, which was provided in both the Senate bill and the House amendment.

6. Investigation by board: The House amendment provided that the board, upon request by any leading cooperative association or upon its own motion, might investigate with respect to any agricultural commodity and make certain determinations of fact. These determinations were roughly whether a surplus of the commodity exists or threatens to exist, whether the existence or threatened existence of such surplus depresses or may depress the price of the commodity below the actual average cost of production for the preceding five years, and whether the commodity and its products are adaptable to storage and future disposal. The Senate bill contained no such provision. The substitute omits it for the reason that substantially all the power conferred by it on the board is included in the general powers vested in the board or in the power of the board to make investigations prior to commencement of marketing periods. The provision is, therefore, unnecessary, particularly when the exercise of the power it confers is unrelated, as a condition precedent to any of the major activities of the board.

7. Definition of surplus: In connection with the loan provisions the Senate bill provided for a finding that there was or might be during the ensuing year a domestic, regional or national, seasonal or year's total surplus, with respect to the commodity.

The House amendment for the purpose of clarification only described the surplus as a seasonal or year's total surplus, produced in the United States and either local or national in extent. The House bill thus emphasizes that while the loan provisions deal only with surpluses of domestic production, on the other hand it is immaterial whether the particular surplus with respect to which the loans for controlling surpluses are made, is nation-wide and exists wherever the commodity is produced or exists merely as to particular regions comparatively local in character. The House amendment also emphasizes that the loan provisions relate to surplus irrespective of whether the surplus is arrived at on the basis of the total production for the year or whether, in the event that there is no year's total surplus, that nevertheless there is during certain seasons of production a temporary seasonal surplus.

The substitute as agreed to by the conferees retains the provisions of the House amendment.

Similar descriptions of surplus were found in both the Senate bill and the House amendment in connection with the marketing agreement provisions, except for the fact that there was no authorization to deal with local surpluses by means of marketing agreements. The House description of surplus was again retained in the substitute in connection with the findings precedent to marketing agreements.

8. Purchases subject to prevailing competitive conditions: The Senate bill provided that the price at which any part of a surplus was to be purchased or disposed of under marketing agreements should not be fixed in the agreements, but that all such purchases and disposals should be made subject to the prevailing competitive conditions of the markets in which they occurred.

The substitute follows the House amendment in omitting this provision in the belief that the provision was unnecessary. This follows, inasmuch as purchases would obviously have to be made in open markets, and that the board is not authorized to fix prices but that any adjustment in prices would result by reason of the price levels established by the tariff and other existing legislation and by reason of the orderly disposal of the surplus brought about because of its control in strong and friendly hands under the marketing agreements which the board is empowed to make with cooperative associations or other agencies.

9. Fee on meat products on hand: The House amendment contained a provision, not found in the Senate bill, under which the board was directed, when any equalization fee was levied on cattle or swine, to impose and collect a similar fee of not less per pound than the fee imposed on cattle or swine, on their food products on hand and owned by any individual or corporation at the commencement of a marketing period for cattle or swine. Sales of such food products owned by retail dealers were excepted. The substitute contains a provision substantially like that of the House amendment, directing that when any equalization fee is collected with respect to cattle or swine, an equalization fee equivalent in amount, as nearly as may be, shall be collected on the first sale of any food product derived from cattle or swine, respectively, if the food product was on hand at the time of the commencement of the marketing period. The substitute likewise exempts from the equalization fee, sales of any food product owned in good faith by retail dealers at the time of the commencement of a marketing period.

10. Fees on importation: The House amendment contained a provision for the collection of an equalization fee during a marketing period in respect of any agricultural commodity on its importation into the United States, and for the collection of substantially an equivalent fee on the importation of any food product of the commodity, with corresponding references throughout the amendment to the collection and use of such fees collected on importation. The Senate bill contained no such provisions. The substitute adopts the provisions of the House amendment.

11. Allocation of revolving fund: The Senate bill provided that at least $200,000,000 of the revolving fund should be available and used as a stabilization fund for financing the purchase, withholding, or disposal of agricultural commodities in the event that a marketing period should be declared for one or more of such commodities and that such fund should be allocated ratably to the stabilization funds for the several commodities according to the values of their respective exportable surpluses. The House amendment contained no such provision. The substitute provides that at least $200,000,000 of the revolving fund shall be made available by the board solely for use in making advances to the stabilization funds for agricultural commodities in respect of which marketing periods are commenced and that in the allocation of such amount among the stabilization funds, the board shall take into consideration the values of the respective commodities.

The substitute differs from the Senate provision in two main respects: First, the affirmative duty is not put upon the board of allocating the $200,000,000 among the various stabilization funds for the reason that the board can not in advance determine the number of stabilization funds. The board is therefore simply directed to take into consideration certain factors in the allocation of such amount. Secondly, the board is directed to take into consideration in such allocation the values of the respective commodities and not the values of the exportable surpluses of the respective commodities. The purpose of the bill to effect the orderly marketing of agricultural commodities might be impeded in the case of commodities having small exportable surpluses, if the allocations of the revolving fund were made solely on the basis of the values of exportable surpluses.

The Senate bill provided that the total amount of loans to cooperative associations should not exceed $250,000,000. The House amendment provided that the total amount of loans should not exceed $400,000,000. The substitute provides that the total amount of loans shall not exceed $200,000,000, so that the total amount of loans authorized together with the amount, namely, $200,000,000, of the revolving fund made available for advances to stabilization funds shall not exceed the total amount of the revolving fund which is $400,000,000.

12. Confidential information: The Senate bill provided that the President might prescribe such limitations as to the use of the information and data which he directed any governmental establishment to furnish to the board as he might deem desirable. The House amendment provided that the President could not direct that the board be furnished with any information or data supplied in confidence to any Government establishment by any person either in pursuance of law or under an agreement with the governmental establishment. The substitute retains the provision of the House amendment.

To authorize the President to require any Government establishment to furnish to the board information given voluntarily to such establishment by any person in confidence and in contemplation of its possession and use only by such establishment makes possible a violation of the confidence of such person, even though the President is empowered to impose limitations upon the use of the information by the board. While the same is not technically true in the case of information which, although given under compulsion of law, is made confidential by law, nevertheless authorization of the President to require the establishment to which such information is furnished to turn it over to the board is contrary to the policy of the law making such information confidential. The possibility that the confidence of persons giving information voluntarily to a Government establishment may be violated by such information being given to the board might prevent the giving of much valuable information to various Government establishments. Under the provision of the substitute the confidence of any informant of any Government establishment will be safeguarded.

13. Fruits and vegetables: The Senate bill provided that fruits and vegetables and beef and beef products were not to be included within the meaning of the term "agricultural commodity." The House amendment contained no such provision. Both the Senate bill and the House amendment required the board to find, among other things, that the nature of an agricultural commodity and its method of marketing were adapted to the use of the marketing agreements before a marketing period could be commenced or equalization fees collected in respect to it. In practice this would have eliminated fruits and vegetables from those sections of the bill relating to marketing agreements and equalization fees.

The substitute, therefore, specifies that those provisions relating to marketing agreements and equalization fees are not applicable to fruits and vegetables, leaving the producers of these commodities free to enjoy the benefits of its other provisions, including those for loans and clearing houses. In adopting the language of the Senate bill the term "perishable" is used in conjunction with "fruits or vegetables," in order to indicate that it is intended to exclude from the marketing agreement and equalization fee provisions only those commodities considered as "fruits or vegetables" as those terms are commonly used. The terms are not used in their broad botanical sense which, if literally applied, might extend their meaning to cover a much broader field than the substitute intends. The substitute follows the House amendment in making the benefits of the measure available to producers of beef cattle if need arises.

14. Penalties: The House amendment provided that sections 123 and 124 of the Penal Code, as amended, should apply to every member, officer, or employee of the board and further declared that any speculation in any agricultural commodity, directly or indirectly, by any member, officer, or employee of the board should be held a violation of section 123 of such act. It, furthermore, made it unlawful for any cooperative association or corporation or other agency acting on behalf of the board under any marketing agreement or for any director, officer, or employee of any such association, corporation, or agency to impart in violation of any regulation of the board any information which had been imparted in confidence by the board to such association, corporation, or agency and for a violation of such provision provided a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both. The Senate bill contained no such provision. The House provision is adopted by the substitute.

15. Application of Federal food and drug act: The Senate bill contained an added provision which did not appear in the House amendment relating to the application of the Federal food and drug act of 1906 to fresh fruits. The substitute omits this provision.

16. Marketing agreement agency: The Senate bill contained the provision that, in the event no cooperative association was found capable of carrying out the marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of the agricultural commodity, then the board might make such agreements with other farm agencies. The House amendment provided that, in such case the board might make such agreements with any other agencies. The House bill is broader than the Senate provision and allows the making of marketing agreements with any agency found best adapted to carry out the purposes of the act, in the event that the cooperative agencies are not able to undertake the agreement. The substitute follows the House provision in this regard.

GILBERT N. HAUGEN,
FRED S. PURNELL,
THOMAS S. WILLIAMS,
DAVID H. KINCHELOE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the report of the conference committee, with a few exceptions, leaves the bill substantially as it was when it was passed by the House. The only provisions of importance in conference are as follows:

Section 4. Commodity advisory councils. See page 5 to page 10. Senate bill required the board to cause to be sent out notices to each cooperative association or other organization which shall nominate not more than seven persons, etc. In all, 150 days are consumed before the advisory council can be organized. The House provisions or substitute directs the board to create an advisory council to be selected from lists submitted by cooperative associations and by governors and heads of the agricultural departments in the several States producing 3 per cent of the total of the commodity, and provides that the particular advisory council shall act within 15 days. (See p. 8644, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.) The advisory council is made a governmental and not a private agency, so as not to improperly delegate legislative power to a nongovernmental agency.

Page 14, paragraph 2, makes available $2,000,000 for the federating, consolidating, merging, or extending the membership of cooperative associations. This we cut to $1,000,000 in conference.

Page 36, Senate bill, excepts fresh or natural fruit from the food and drugs act. Senate recedes.

Page 36, lines 21 to 23, Senate bill, defines agricultural commodity to mean an agricultural commodity which is not a fruit or vegetable or beef or beef products. Conference agreed to an amendment "shall not apply to perishable fruit and vegetables" in respect to marketing agreements, which will give fruit and vegetable growers the benefit of the loan and clearing house and terminal marketing provisions.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. As I understand the statement accompanying this conference report, the word "perishable" is used in the ordinary colloquial meaning and applies to apples and fruits of that character?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 38.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 204, nays 117, answered "present" 1, not voting 108, as follows:

PROCEEDINGS AT THE UNVEILING OF THE STATUE OF ALEXANDER HAMILTON STEPHENS

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania presents a privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 6

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Alexander Hamilton Stephens, presented by the State of Georgia, 5,000 copies, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Georgia.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, and shall procure suitable illustrations to be bound with these proceedings.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORT OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ON COOPERATING MARKETING OF FARM PRODUCTS

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I present another privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania presents a privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 18

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 1,500 copies of Senate Document No. 95, entitled "Report of the Federal Trade Commission on Cooperating Marketing of Farm Products," transmitted to the Senate on May 2, 1928, in response to Senate Resolution No. 34, Sixty-ninth Congress, be printed with illustrations, of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONVICT-MADE GOODS

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 7729, to divest goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by convicts or prisoners of their interstate character in certain cases. Pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that one-half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] in opposition to the bill, and that the other half be controlled by myself in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House bill 7729, and pending that motion asks unanimous consent that the time be divided equally, one-half to be controlled by himself in favor of the bill, and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] in opposition to the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 7729, with Mr. BEEDY in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined, wholly or in part, by convicts or prisoners, except paroled convicts or prisoners, or in any penal and/or reformatory institutions, transported into any State or Territory of the United States and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods, wares, and merchandise had been manufactured, produced, or mined in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in the original package or otherwise.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, after line 6, insert:

"SEC. 2. This act shall take effect two years after the date of its approval."

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], the author of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 15 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I fully realize the obligation society has in furthering the rehabilitation and reformation of the inmates of our penal institutions. I also believe that States should have the right to regulate its own penal institutions and protect its own industry and business, and free labor from prison competition. And this is what is proposed in the bill now before us for consideration. This measure does not represent a new legislative proposal. The same has been considered by Congress several times in the past. The purpose of the bill is to divest prison-made products of their interstate character, when arriving in a State, other than that in which they were manufactured or produced, and makes them subject to the laws and regulations of the State into which they were transported.

There are several States which have laws regulating the sale of prison-made goods produced in their own penal institutions. But at the present time there is no way that these States can regulate the sale and distribution of prison-made goods that are shipped into the State through interstate commerce. My own State of Ohio has a law regulating the sale and distribution of its own prison-made products. And at the same time it is a favorite dumping ground for prison-made goods from other States. It has been stated that last year more than $1,000,000 worth of prison-made goods were sold in Ohio which came from border States.

The State of Ohio does not sell a dollar's worth of its own prison products on the competitive open market, at home or outside the State, and yet we are powerless to regulate or control the sale of prison-made goods coming into the State through interstate commerce. I am aware of the fact that, should Congress enact a law preventing the shipment of legitimate goods in interstate commerce, it would be unconstitutional.

The bill which we now have before us does not attempt to interfere with or prohibit the transportation of prison-made goods from one State into another.

It does not compel the enactment of any State law.

It does not alter or interfere with the existing laws of any State.

Nor does it in any way interfere with the supervision or management of any State penal institution.

The opposition to this bill is confined to prison officials and prison-labor contractors. Many of the State-prison officials, who are opposed to this bill, are capable and conscientious men and women, who are trying to do the best they can with a great problem.

But when it comes to the prison-labor contractor, he has no interest in the prisoner only to the extent of making money out of his labor.

Millions of dollars profit are realized every year by these contractors out of the labor of prisoners.

The prison contractor may have a legal right to contract for the labor of a prisoner. But I say it is morally wrong for him to take advantage of unfortunate inmates in our penal institutions for the purpose of making money.

In some of the States where the contract system is in effect the work of the prisoners is under the supervision of a representative of the contractor.

The hearings before the Senate committee on this bill will show that in one State, which had a law requiring the labeling of prison-made goods, the prisoners in the penal institutions of that State were required to place false labels of misrepresentation on shirts, clothing, shoes, which were shipped into other States to be dumped on the market in competition with legitimate industry and free labor, or, in other words, in order to enable the contractor to fool the public and make large profits the prisoners were required to sew false labels on shirts, clothing, and so forth.

I have here copies of the labels these prisoners were required to sew on these shirts and clothing. This one says:

Cownie's dependable garments, Des Moines, Iowa.

These garments were not made in Des Moines, but were made in a State prison 500 miles from Des Moines.

The Ohio Garment Co., Springfield, Ohio. Victor. Lot, —; size, —; warranted.

These goods were not made in Ohio.

The Trojan work shirt. Lot, —; size, —; 718; trade-mark registered.

Those were the labels these prisoners were required to sew on this clothing. Here is another one:

The Echo shirt. The Lawrenceburg Overall Manufacturing Co., Lawrenceburg, Ind.

Here is another one:

A shirt with a reputation; tailored by Packard, Chicago.

Holson. Holson means bigger and better. Lot, —; size, —. Giant. 1800K. 17.

Then here are the labels they had to put on the furniture manufactured in that State prison:

On every piece Karpen guaranteed construction furniture, upholstered furniture, hand-woven fiber, and enameled cane davenport beds, windsor chairs.

Karpen hand-woven fiber: Pattern No. —; finish, —; uph. No. 4174 RC; order No. —. S. Karpen & Bros., Chicago; Michigan City, Ind.; New York.

In this same State prison shoes were manufactured which carried the shield of the United States, and the words "Munson Army last" was stamped in the sole. The prison officials and contractors did not attempt to market these goods, labeled and stamped as they were, in the State in which they were made, for that would be a violation of the State law.

I say it is morally wrong for prison officials to compel the false labeling of prison-made goods in order to promote their sale on the open market. On that Secretary of Labor James J. Davis has this to say:

The prisoner who sews a false label in a prison-made garment, indicating that it was made by an outside manufacturer, knows he is forced to become a liar and a cheat. If our jails and penitentiaries teach a man to lie, what can we expect of that man when they set him free.

One prison warden appearing before the committee stated:

That a shoe manufacturer had equipped a shoe factory in the State prison in which were employed 200 prisoners producing 1,200 pairs of shoes per day. The contractor paid the prisoner 6 cents per pair for his labor and gave to the State 10 cents, making the total labor cost on a pair of shoes, while the minimum cost for labor in the manufacture of a pair of shoes where free labor is employed is 42 cents.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it seems to me the most important thing in this bill is whether or not each State in the Union shall have the power to regulate the sale of prison-made goods, and that is the only issue involved in this measure.

It has the indorsement of the American Federation of Labor, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, and manufacturers representing more than $2,500,000,000 invested in industry which employs free labor. President Coolidge, in his first message to Congress, December 6, 1923, had this to say on this important question:

The National Government has never given adequate attention to its prison problems. It ought to provide employment in such forms of production as can be used by the Government, though not sold to the public in competition with private business, for all prisoners who can be placed at work, and for which they should receive a reasonable compensation, available for their dependents.

Two independent reformatories are needed; one for the segregation of women, and another for the segregation of young men serving their first sentence.

The President realized we had a very serious problem before us, and he expressly advocated that all goods made in our Federal prisons should be used and sold only for Federal purposes.

You men will recall that when we had the Treasury appropriation bill before the House during this session of Congress it carried an appropriation for the erection of a brick plant at the Federal prison in Chillicothe, Ohio. There was an amendment offered to that provision which provided that no brick that was manufactured in the plant could be used except for the erection of Federal buildings.

This is almost a unanimous report from the Committee on Labor, and we come to you and ask your careful consideration of this measure. It seems to me every man who is in favor of State rights should support this bill because it does not prevent the shipment of prison-made goods in interstate commerce, it changes no State law, it compels no State law to be enacted, but leaves it entirely to the State to regulate the sale of convict-made goods.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. I believe the gentleman has answered the question I had in mind. I wanted to know whether or not there was anything in the bill which would interfere with a prison farm or a prison selling in that State any goods provided such sale is not prohibited by State law.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not at all.

Mr. GREEN. Then if Florida, for instance, sends goods to Georgia or to Alabama, the products it sends to those States will be governed by the State law of Alabama or Georgia?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. That is it exactly.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEARNS. Is the manufacturer of goods required to equip these prisons with the necessary machinery to make the goods?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not think he equips it. I know the warden from the Vermont State Penitentiary stated before the committee that the contractor had equipped the prison with the machinery for the manufacture of shoes.

Mr. KEARNS. But he pays nothing as rent.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. He pays no rent and no taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. [Applause.]

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill we are about to consider has been knocking at the door of Congress for three or four years. I want to say that I have never, when I felt at all justified in supporting it, opposed any legislation that was being backed by labor or by labor organizations. I have never opposed, for the sake of offering opposition, any legislation that was backed by either of the other organizations that are mentioned in this report as favoring this bill.

It is stated at the outset of the report on this bill that "the penitentiary problem is a problem for the State." I admit that this first sentence states the truth, but I deny that the proposition we are dealing with here in this bill is a penitentiary problem. It is a problem having primarily to do with interstate commerce, and nothing else.

The next sentence in this report is that "the factors that enter into its adjustment are so many and so varied as to make it essentially a State problem, and no Federal impediment should stand in the way of any State which seeks to determine its own prison affairs and the regulation of the sale of prison products."

I do not agree that this sentence is founded on a sound premise. It begs the question to start with, and to follow it and to concede the statement leads one into error at the beginning.

There was once what was known as the Malthusian doctrine. It was that population tends to increase faster than the power of providing food. To use his words, Malthus said:

There is a natural tendency and constant effort in population to increase beyond the means of subsistence.

To state it differently: That population, constantly tending to increase, must, when unrestrained, ultimately press against the limits of subsistence not as against a fixed but as against an elastic barrier, which makes the procurement of subsistence progressively more and more difficult.

This theory has been fully disproved and overthrown. Our farm population is growing smaller each year because of the drift to the city, yet our farmers produce more than ever before, and the surplus of farm products become greater and greater each year. Better methods, machinery, and ways of handling the business on the farm has done this. The power of the people to produce the necessaries of life is not measured by the necessaries of life actually produced. Population is growing in every section of our country. New occupations open up and employ labor. Our country has rapidly advanced in wealth, and with it has come the benefits of employment and labor.

I do not think this is true because the prison goods that are put on the market are so infinitesimal in comparison with the great quantity of every like kind of goods that is manufactured and is to be found in the commercial world that we can hardly take note of it.

In order that the House can fully appreciate how small is the per cent of goods made by convict labor that goes on the market, I am placing in my speech a very thoroughly prepared table submitted by Mr. John J. Hannan, president of the State Board of Control of the State of Wisconsin to the Senate in the hearings of a bill similar to this. It will be found on page 145 of the Senate hearings on bill S. 1940, and is as follows:

[1] Twine and rope have been combined because no separate figures are obtainable for the prison production of these two products. Almost the entire total of the prison production, however, is of twine, only 3 prisons producing any rope and these in small quantities. The free-labor production of twine alone was valued at $51,883,938. As the value of the twine and rope produced in prisons was $5,588,372 and nearly all of this represented twine, the prison production of twine can be put down as amounting to about 10 per cent of the free-labor production.

[2] The figure for the free-labor production is the census total for "wearing apparel," excluding custom-made clothing, shoes, knit goods, and shirts.

[3] Chairs represent the major part of the prison production of furniture, accounting for $2,228,460 of the $2,913,793, total value of furniture produced in prisons. In this particular line prison production is a much more important factor in the total products thrown on the market than in "furniture" as a whole.

[4] The free-labor production is for brick, tile, terra cotta, fire clay, and other clay products, except pottery.

[5] The free-labor production does not include agricultural implements manufactured in plants whose principal product is some other line.

I am sure that everyone agrees with the economic proposition that the man who is capable of producing with his labor is entitled to labor. It makes no difference if he is behind prison bars, he is entitled to exercise himself in labor. This is the first fundamental principle that a man must look to if he is to preserve life itself. He must have activity and he must labor, and we go back and we find that a man is commanded to labor if he is to live and have the things that are necessary to sustain his life; that is, clothes, food, shelter, and heat.

Some one may say that if a man is to be thrown out of work because he is competing with some prisoner that is incarcerated behind walls he can never pass beyond, let the man who is behind the walls be kept in idleness and let the man outside labor. This will not remedy the situation. If we want to do full justice to the people that are unfortunate, those who have looked to the man who is behind the prison walls, let us provide a system which will pay for the labor of the man behind the prison walls and pass that on to his unfortunate dependents on the outside. Do not come into the Congress and say to this man that he must remain in idleness, that he must languish behind prison walls, that he shall not have the exercise which is so wholesome to his body and which is so necessary to prison discipline, but that he must languish behind the walls and his dependents must languish on the outside.

Now, what is the main objection that is urged to this bill? It is primarily this: To say to the States, the same States which would have the power to prohibit the sale of goods that come from prison farms or prison factories within other States, you may prohibit the sale of these goods within your territory because they come from this source. Why do not these States say, by their legislative enactments, "We will have no more of this contract labor; we will adopt a sensible, sane method of handling our prisoners, and we will handle them in some other way besides leasing or contracting them out to some taskmaster who has no concern for their welfare or the welfare of anyone connected with them, but will use them and their lives in the manner of a hard taskmaster in order to produce dollars for ourselves."

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Does the gentleman think it is necessary for Congress to pass a law in order to enable the State legislature to pass a law keeping out prison-made goods?

Mr. BUSBY. I believe prison-made goods are a subject for interstate commerce just as truly as any other goods.

Mr. SMITH. This bill attempts to give jurisdiction to State legislatures, which already have jurisdiction to pass laws to keep out any commodities that are injurious to public health or the public morals, and a law to do more than that would be unconstitutional.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman has got his law wrong.

Mr. BUSBY. That might be a question of police power. Whether it would reach that far I am not advised. The Constition provides that "Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce between foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." The most we can say is that Congress has been given exclusive power over the subject of interstate commerce—whether it be prison-made goods or something else. The most we can say for the bill is that while Congress has the power it will pass it back to the States. I am not sure what the courts would say about Congress regulating interstate commerce in that sort of a way—that is, by passing the power bestowed on it back to the States from which it came.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. SHREVE. How will this bill affect our own Federal penitentiaries in the matter of things that we are now manufacturing? In the last few years we have been trying to find something that might be manufactured in the Federal penitentiaries that would not be objected to by labor unions, and yet would give employment to men in the penitentiary?

Mr. BUSBY. I will come to that immediately. I would like to say that the present managers, the trustees of the penitentiaries, have found that it is absolutely necessary to afford some kind of employment, some kind of activity for these prisoners, if they are to have good prison discipline.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I will take 10 minutes more.

The best way they have found to control inmates is by employment which gives them the greatest latitude and activity in the open air. Factories have been provided that are as near complying with that as possible, and yet maintaining that sort of supervision over them to prevent them from escaping from prison. Our States have done that, the Federal Government has done that thing, but every time we try to do something we turn to find a group of objectors who say you are trying to do something we do not want you to accomplish. Then they get in touch with an organization, and that organization in touch with a third organization, and all together they swoop down on Congress, and the Members do like we have seen them do within the past week. They all begin to dodge before the bill is read by the Clerk. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I suggest that as far as I know goods made in the Federal prison are manufactured for Federal use and do not go into interstate commerce.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Suppose you had a law in Mississippi regulating prison-made goods made in your own penal institution. Would you think it would be fair for another State to flood your State with convict-made goods over which you had no regulation or control?

Mr. BUSBY. I think as an economic proposition it is not right to make an isolated territory out of any State where interstate commerce that is proper and right and fair could be prohibited from entry. I think you are wrong to start with on any such proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does the gentleman think it is proper for a contractor to suck the lifeblood, the profits, out of these men and ship the goods to my State of Ohio?

Mr. BUSBY. That is like this bill and report—it assumes premises that do not exist. It is unfair because it begs the question from start to finish. Simply because you have gone along and subordinated the original idea of regulating interstate commerce, and we are dropping back into the error from which the Constitution makers tried to save us, that from which they tried to prevent us from falling into. Whenever you have permitted for one reason prohibition of commerce in one State, and prohibited it in another for a different cause, and in a third State for still another cause, you have created a confusion throughout the country.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. The question was asked a moment ago as to the effect of this bill on goods manufactured in Federal penitentiaries. I want to know if the following language in the bill would not prohibit the Federal prisoners from working at all? I refer to lines 7 and 8 of the bill:

* * * transported into any State or Territory of the United States and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory—

And so forth.

Under that language, how are you going to bring merchandise from Federal penitentiaries in for use or consumption?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to answer that question?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. We have an amendment to correct that proposition when the time comes.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to tell how far we are going to carry this theory of government when we once get it started. I am sure that no one on the floor of this House can foresee the end of this thing. You know that this is the beginning—the very beginning. There is nothing like it on the statute books and there has never been anything like it.

Mr. COMBS. The Wilson Act, passed in 1890, is directly analogous to this in divesting goods of their interstate character.

Mr. BUSBY. Was not that declared unconstitutional?

Mr. COMBS. No; it was upheld by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BUSBY. It has no bearing on the proposition that I am arguing, because it dealt with a question that involved the police powers of a State. I want to return to the thought contained in the bill, that we will not be permitted to carry goods from one State to another and be free from the possibility that that State may outlaw the products when they get there. After a dealer has purchased goods and shipped them into another State he might find himself like the Russian Government did when they shipped $5,000,000 of gold into the United States recently and found it to be outlawed and thus had to be returned to some place in Europe.

Mr. Chairman, goods are worth nothing to the owner unless they can be sold or used. This bill is absolutely an attempt to carry back to the States the power which they expressly placed in the Federal Government to control commerce among the several States. I want to show you how it might affect my own State of Mississippi. We used to have the old contract system under which we tried to operate our penitentiaries.

We contracted the prisoners out to the highest bidder for certain purposes. We found that the contractors were not always humane toward the prisoners. We found that there were abuses of every kind and complaints such as we have recently heard about some of the States in the Union.

We therefore tried another plan. The State purchased farms and on those farms these convicts are worked, worked under overseers out in the open air, in the most healthful condition in which they could be placed. We have very thorough discipline. There is no mutiny or unbecoming conduct in the mass amongst our prisoners. We have gone along with that system.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. KINDRED. Did the gentleman say that it is humane to farm out prisoners at the present time?

Mr. BUSBY. I did not say that we farmed out our prisoners. I said that we worked them on State farms.

Mr. KINDRED. Did they not work under contract in the gentleman's State at one time?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes, they did; until we learned a better way, that is what I am telling you. You gentlemen who are complaining ought not to let your States continue to contract their prisoners out. Correct that and you will have all of this trouble which you are trying so correct through Congress taken care of at home.

Mr. CARSS. If we pass this law, that will be a move in that direction, will it not?

Mr. BUSBY. It will not.

Mr. CARSS. If we prohibit contract goods coming into a State and being sold, naturally the contractor will be put out of business.

Mr. BUSBY. You are going at it in a far-fetched way. Why not go the State legislatures and tell them that they have adopted the wrong system and work it out in that way?

Mr. KINDRED. There are two major things that are desirable to accomplish by the bill which we are now discussing. One is to give wholesome and humane employment to the great body of prisoners in the respective States, and the other is to meet the objections of the American Federation of Labor to the situation that now exists. How are you going to do it?

Mr. BUSBY. I do not know that I am going to do it either way; I do not know that I am going to be scared to death by not doing it. I think one reason we are lined up in the way we are is because the manufacturers and the organizations are outside of the prisons and can vote, and the fellows that you are talking about and discriminating against are behind the prison bars and can not vote.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. As a fundamental question, does the gentleman believe we should be legislating for the men behind the bars in preference to the free labor?

Mr. BUSBY. No; I did not say that; but I do not think that we ought to try to crucify the fellows behind the bars here on the floor of the House of Representatives, and I do not think we ought to be discriminating against them because they can not be heard simply because we get a call from back home.

Mr. CASEY. Do you think we should be here discriminating against the free labor that has to pay the taxes to feed those people?

Mr. BUSBY. We tried in Mississippi the contract system for a long time, but it did not work well. We tried another plan. We bought three State farms. One of the easiest crops we could raise was cotton, so we placed our convicts out in the open on these farms, in competition, you will say, with farmers. They produced hundreds of thousands of bales of cotton, and instead of being a burden on the State treasury every year we found they could produce these products to advantage and add considerably to the State treasury. I have a letter here from Dr. L. T. Fox, superintendent of the State penitentiary. Under date of April 9, 1928, he says:

MISSISSIPPI STATE PENITENTIARY,
Parchman, Miss., April 9, 1928.

Hon. JEFF BUSBY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BUSBY: There has been introduced in Congress what is known as the Hawes-Cooper bill, restricting the sale of prison-made goods to State institutions.

I do not know all the provisions of the bill and do not know that it would apply to our cotton raised on the penitentiary farms, but the principle of the bill is wrong because such a policy would ultimately lead to enforced idleness of all prisoners, which everyone knowing anything about penal administration knows, is bad for the prisoners and unsound economically.

I am writing to urge that you bend every effort to defeat this bill. If it did apply to our cotton production, it would wreck our penitentiary system which is, without question, the greatest system in existence, that of working the prisoners in the open air. Furthermore, it would mean a great economic loss to the taxpayers of the State. We have during the last four years put $729,000 more into the treasury than we have taken out.

Expressing the hope that you will use your influence against this bill and with personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

L. T. FOX, Superintendent.

That is the best system, and that is the system on which, if the welfare workers would fight for to get the penitentaries on a sound basis, we could back them and they would receive our support.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman has expressed the hope that something might be done to do something for the people who are dependents on these convicts. Did the State do anything for them as the result of this work? Did they return any portion of that income?

Mr. BUSBY. I can not say they did; but I have never been a member of the State legislature, and can not be held responsible for that.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Is it not a fact that some of the States do give a portion of the money derived to the prisoners?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes. Now, I have no criticism for the people who are backing a bill like this, or for the organizations that are backing the bill; but I can not understand how we can sweep aside all economic principles and the Constitution and do the other things for which there is no reason or justification. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Labor had full and complete hearings on this bill. Many manufacturers and representatives of labor appeared before the committee in favor of the bill. The Federation of Women's Clubs, through their representatives, also appeared before the committee on behalf of the bill. Special opportunity was given to the opponents of the bill to be heard. The committee was particularly anxious to hear every objection that could be urged. Most of those who appeared against the bill were connected in some manner with the management of prisons.

In the consideration of this bill we are confronted by two major questions. First, is the policy of the bill sound? Second, is the bill constitutional? On account of my limited time I shall confine myself to the second question.

It is no doubt true that this bill, if enacted into law, will be assailed in the courts on the ground that it is unconstitutional. It was urged before the committee that the bill was unconstitutional, and I presume a similar claim will be made here on the floor. In my judgment, however, this bill is constitutional, and I fully believe that if it ever comes before the Supreme Court of the United States it will be sustained by that high tribunal.

Before proceeding further, however, permit me to suggest that simply because some one questions the constitutionality of a bill is not a sufficient reason for voting against it. True, no Member should vote for a bill which he himself regards as unconstitutional, but if a bill embodies your convictions and you believe it is constitutional, you should not hesitate to vote for it whatever others may do. Nothing is conjured up more often or more readily by those opposed to a bill than a doubt as to its constitutionality. Practically every progressive piece of legislation has been attacked upon that ground. Bear in mind also that if a bill is defeated here there is no way in which it can be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States to have its constitutionality determined.

You are all familiar with what is known as the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. This clause provides that Congress shall have power—

To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

Many learned dissertations have been written on this clause. Numerous decisions have construed it, but it is still open to discussion and probably will be debated as long as our Government survives. I do not claim that I can throw any new light on this important and much-discussed subject. All I can hope to do is to call your attention to a few important decisions and indicate to you the bearing that these decisions, as it appears to me, have upon the bill now under consideration. First, permit me to call particular attention to the terms of this bill. It defines no crimes and provides no penalties. No appropriation is required to carry it into effect. It simply divests prison-made goods of their interstate character and makes them subject to the laws of the different States to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods had been manufactured in such States.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Does the gentleman make any provision to disclose the identity of the goods? Is there any machinery set up in the bill to reveal the character of the goods?

Mr. KOPP. No. That all depends on State legislation. This is simply an enabling act.

As you are well aware, by the tenth amendment all powers not delegated to the United States nor prohibited to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people. This amendment has often been invoked in attacking the constitutionality of an act of Congress. Again and again it has been claimed that Congress has trespassed upon the reserved powers of the States. No such claim, however, can be made here. Under this bill Congress instead of taking away the reserved powers of the States protects them most fully. While the bill does not delegate any powers to the States, it does, in fact, give certain State laws a broader application. This bill, if passed, will be an enabling act for the States.

Quite a number of States have passed laws regulating the sale of convict-made goods. The most common requirement has been the marking or branding of convict-made goods before offering them for sale. All of these laws have been held unconstitutional as to convict-made goods shipped in from other States. Thus the only effect of these laws has been to restrict the sale of those convict-made goods manufactured in the State where sold. The States have been, and are to-day, helpless against the convict-made goods shipped in from other States. This bill will enable the States to regulate the sale of prison-made goods shipped in from other States as well as those manufactured or produced within their own borders.

The history of the enabling act upon which this bill is based is an interesting one. The question as to its constitutionality came before the Supreme Court of the United States in passing upon the Wilson law, which went into effect on August 8, 1890. Iowa had adopted prohibition by statute, but the Federal courts held that as long as intoxicating liquors were in the original packages they could nevertheless be sold within the State. Senator Wilson, of Iowa, introduced a bill to remedy the situation and this bill after being vigorously attacked as unconstitutional was passed and became a law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And two months later a decision was laid down in the original-package case?

Mr. KOPP. I thank the gentleman for his interruption. The terms of this bill were as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids, transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall upon arrival in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

The Wilson law was quickly attacked in the courts. Kansas at the time also had a prohibitory law. A citizen of that State made a sale of intoxicating liquors in original packages shipped from Kansas City, Mo. He was arrested under the State law and immediately applied to the United States circuit court for a writ of habeas corpus. The case went to the Supreme Court of the United States and there the law was fully sustained. (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545.) Said the court:

It does not admit of argument that Congress can neither delegate its own powers nor enlarge those of a State. This being so, it is urged that the act of Congress can not be sustained as a regulation of commerce. * * *

Congress has not attempted to delegate the power to regulate commerce, or to exercise any power reserved to the States, or to grant a power not possessed by the States, or to adopt State laws. It has taken its own course and made its own regulation, applying to these subjects of interstate commerce one common rule, whose uniformity is not affected by variations in State laws in dealing with such property.

The principle upon which local option laws, so called, have been sustained is that while the legislature can not delegate its power to make a law, it can make a law which leaves it to municipalities or the people to determine some fact or state of things, upon which the action of the law may depend; but we do not rest the validity of the act of Congress on this analogy. The power over interstate commerce is too vital to the integrity of the Nation to be qualified by any refinement of reasoning. The power to regulate is solely in the General Government, and it is an essential part of that regulation to prescribe the regular means for accomplishing the introduction and incorporation of articles into and with the mass of property in the country or State. (12 Wheat. 448.)

No reason is perceived why, if Congress chooses to provide that certain designated subjects of interstate commerce shall be governed by a rule which divests them of that character at an earlier period of time than would otherwise be the case, it is not within its competency to do so.

The bill we are now considering was patterned after the Wilson law. All it seeks to do is to divest convict-made goods of their interstate character earlier than would otherwise be the case. If the Wilson law was constitutional, why is not this bill constitutional?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman draw this distinction, that in the Wilson law they were dealing with a class of goods that was considered immoral? That involves the police power of the State. In this case the goods are apparently innocent.

Mr. KOPP. That was not the point made by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They were dealing with that fact, and the facts of the two cases are different.

Mr. KOPP. I will answer that a little more fully later.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Right on that point, does the gentleman think Congress could pass a law providing that goods made by Chinamen could be dealt with as here provided, or goods made by Methodists or by Baptists or by white people, as distinguished from others?

Mr. KOPP. No.

Mr. HUDSON. Why not? This bill involves a class of goods made by a particular class of people.

Mr. KOPP. I am not giving you my opinion, but the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HUDSON. But the Supreme Court was rendering a decision in regard to an act involving an article which is considered injurious. That was the case before the court.

Mr. KOPP. It did not say so. The language in that is exceedingly broad.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Were you referring to the language in the Rahrer case?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is familiar with the fact that the statute in the Rahrer case is materially different from the statute under consideration at this time, in that it provided that the commodities entering interstate commerce came under the jurisdiction of laws involving the police power.

Mr. KOPP. I think that would be the same thing here; I do not think it would be any different.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Why did not the gentleman's committee incorporate that language?

Mr. KOPP. I did not draw the bill, I will say to the gentleman, but I think the effect is just the same, as far as the result is concerned.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In other words, the gentleman does not think the police power had anything to do with the decision of the Supreme Court in the Rahrer case?

Mr. KOPP. I think it had. If the State had had no police power, it could not constitutionally have passed such a law; and if Iowa could not constitutionally have passed a prohibitory law, then the Wilson law would not have had any effect.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman understand that any law that would be enacted after this bill becomes a law would have to be bottomed upon the police power of the State?

Mr. KOPP. Yes; and it must be constitutional.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But would it have to be bottomed on the police power?

Mr. KOPP. Generally speaking; yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What is the ground for sustaining the constitutionality of these statutes in the States, where they have been upheld as a regulation of police power?

Mr. KOPP. I will come to that a little later.

After the Wilson law had been enacted and had been held to be constitutional the prohibition States found that one important difficulty in enforcing the prohibitory laws still remained. By reason of the Wilson law it was no longer legal to sell liquor in the original package in prohibition States, but it was still legal to ship liquor in the original package to residents of prohibition States.

In order to make that impossible the Webb-Kenyon bill was passed during the closing days of the third session of the Sixty-second Congress. This law entirely prohibited the shipment of liquor into prohibition States.

At the time the bill was passed, William H. Taft, now Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, was President, and George W. Wickersham was Attorney General. When the bill reached President Taft, Attorney General Wickersham submitted to the President a strong opinion against the constitutionality of the bill and President Taft, after very full consideration, vetoed the bill upon that ground. The bill was passed over the veto of the President and became a law. In due time it was brought to the attention of the Supreme Court of the United States. By that body, through Chief Justice White, it was held to be constitutional.

I shall refer to the opinion itself, but before taking that up, let me refer to the veto of President Taft. In his veto he anticipated what the law would be in case the Webb-Kenyon law was sustained. You will find this language in his veto message:

> If Congress, however, may in addition entirely suspend the operation of the interstate-commerce clause upon a lawful subject of interstate commerce and turn the regulation of interstate commerce over to the States in respect to it, it is difficult to see how it may not suspend interstate commerce in respect to every subject of commerce wherever the police power of the State can be exercised to hinder or obstruct that commerce.

Attorney General Wickersham also recognized that if the Webb-Kenyon law was sustained it would broaden the powers of Congress beyond his previous conception. The closing paragraph of his opinion was as follows:

> The proposition begs the whole question under consideration and can only be conceded if it be held that Congress can abdicate entirely its power over interstate commerce in an article which it does not itself declare to be "an outlaw of commerce," but which it leaves to the varying legislation of the respective States to more or less endow with qualities of outlawry.

The decision sustaining the Webb-Kenyon law was rendered in Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland Railway Co. (242 U. S. 311). I have not the time to quote at length from the opinion of the court but I do want to call your attention to one statement. Said the court:

> Reading the Webb-Kenyon law in the light thus thrown upon it by the Wilson Act and the decisions of this court which sustained and applied it, there is no room for doubt that it was enacted simply to extend that which was done by the Wilson Act, that is to say, its purpose was to prevent the immunity characteristic of interstate commerce from being used to permit the receipt of liquor through such commerce in States contrary to their laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes.

President Taft became Chief Justice Taft, and in Brooks v. United States (267 U. S. 432), decided in 1925, as Chief Justice he referred to the decision in Clark Distilling Co. against Western Maryland Railway Co. and thus interpreted that decision:

> In Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland Railway Co. (242 U. S. 311) it was held that Congress had power to forbid the introduction of intoxicating liquors into any State in which their use was prohibited in order to prevent the use of interstate commerce to promote that which was illegal in the State.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not true that on January 8, 1917, when the Webb-Kenyon Act was sustained, the Supreme Court sustained the act of the West Virginia Legislature prohibiting the importation of intoxicating liquors into the State for personal use by citizens of the State?

Mr. KOPP. That is true.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield right at that point?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. Do I understand that the gentleman has any cases dealing with a subject other than intoxicating liquors?

Mr. KOPP. I will come to that.

Mr. BUSBY. I would like to hear the gentleman on that.

Mr. KOPP. The purpose of this bill is "to prevent the use of interstate commerce to promote that which is illegal" in many States. Legislature after legislature has passed laws regulating the sale of convict-made goods, but interstate commerce has been used to circumvent and defeat all such legislation. The States are helpless. The States do not ask that the Federal Government assume any burden, but they do ask that convict-made goods be divested of their interstate character in order that interstate commerce may no longer be used to promote that which is illegal in the States.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does the gentleman take the position that the decision of the Supreme Court in the Webb-Kenyon Act case is a precedent for this case?

Mr. KOPP. No; I do not claim that, but I do claim that the Wilson law is a precedent.

Mr. BURTNESS. From what little study I have been able to make of the matter I have assumed that the decision in the Wilson case can well be cited as a precedent for this kind of legislation, but surely not under the decision in the Webb-Kenyon Act case, because the decision in that case was based on an entirely different proposition.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. KOPP. I must ask to be excused until I have made my statement.

To my mind, the real question to be determined, if this bill is enacted into law, will not be whether it is constitutional but whether the State laws in reference to convict-made goods are constitutional. We have 48 States. Many different laws may be passed in the regulation of convict-made goods. At this time there are quite a number of such laws on the statute books of the States. Some States require a license to sell convict-made goods, others that a merchant selling convict-made goods must put up a sign in large letters advising the public of such fact. One State, I believe, provides that the goods made by convicts must be sold for not less than the wholesale price of similar goods. The most general provision is the one that requires convict-made goods to be marked or branded before being offered for sale. The Wilson law, though sustained, did not give life to an unconstitutional State law. It only made State laws, that were valid as to intrastate liquors, valid and effective as to interstate liquors. This bill, if enacted into law, can never make valid and effective as to interstate shipments of convict-made goods any laws which are not valid and effective as to intrastate convict-made goods. No one need fear that by this bill we can breathe life into an unconstitutional State law. No such result can possibly follow, for if a State law is invalid as to intrastate goods it will also be invalid as to interstate shipments of goods. The very language of this bill says that interstate shipments of convict-made goods shall be subject to the laws of any State "to the same extent and in the same manner as if such goods, wares, and merchandise had been manufactured, produced, or mined in such State or Territory." If this bill is passed, the real battle will not be over its constitutionality but over the constitutionality of the different State statutes that may be passed on the subject of convict-made goods. If this bill is passed, it will be held applicable to every constitutional State law and inapplicable to every unconstitutional State law.

It may be claimed that States can not pass any constitutional and valid statutes regulating the sale of convict-made goods and that, therefore, to pass this bill will prove to be useless and futile. I doubt whether anyone will take such an extreme position, but lest some one may do so I shall say a few words on this point.

That convict-made goods are a real problem has been recognized by Congress for many years. The importation of foreign convict-made goods is absolutely prohibited. Our statute on that subject provides that—> all goods, wares, articles, and merchandise manufactured, wholly or in part, in any foreign country by convict labor shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is prohibited.

Though protected by a high tariff, we yet provide that under no circumstances shall foreign convict-made goods be permitted to enter our markets. Why? Because we recognize that they are a menace to our people.

In State v. Hawkins (157 N. Y. 1) the Court of Appeals of New York passed upon a statute requiring that all convict-made goods, including those shipped in from other States, be branded before being exposed for sale. The defendant was convicted under this statute and his case finally reached the Court of Appeals. The particular goods which this defendant had exposed for sale had been made by convicts in Ohio and had been shipped into New York from that State. The New York court held that the statute was in conflict with and repugnant to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, and for that reason invalid.

Judge O'Brien, who wrote the majority opinion, personally went further and also held the statute to be unconstitutional on the further ground that it was an unauthorized limitation of the freedom of the individual to buy and sell articles of merchandise. No other judge, however, concurred in the latter view. One of the dissenting judges was Alton B. Parker, who was chief justice at the time, and who afterwards, as you all know, became a candidate for President. Judge Parker, in referring to the statute requiring the branding of prison-made goods before being exposed for sale, said in his dissenting opinion:

> It simply requires that prison-made merchandise shall be so branded that our citizens shall know where the goods they are buying were made. This they have a right to know.

Judge Bartlett also rendered a dissenting opinion, and, among other things, said:

> The precise question, then, is whether it is competent for this State, in the exercise of the police power, in order to promote the public welfare and prosperity, to impose the restriction, already pointed out, upon the sale of convict-made goods.
> I am of the opinion that it is for two reasons: (1) It is self-evident that the protection of free labor from competition with convict-made goods in our domestic markets will promote the public welfare and prosperity; and (2) it is competent for the State to protect its citizen from fraud or deception when any such goods are offered for sale, by advising him of the fact that they are convict made, so that he may act with full knowledge in the premises.

Only one of the seven judges then serving upon the Court of Appeals of the State of New York regarded this statute as unconstitutional because it restricted the freedom to buy and sell.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPP. I can not yield now on account of my limited time.

Mr. HERSEY. The gentleman is citing a dissenting opinion.

Mr. KOPP. Yes. I stated that Judge O'Brien went further in his opinion, and declared that it was an unauthorized limitation of the freedom of the individual to buy and sell articles of merchandise; or, in other words, it interfered with the freedom of contract; but on this question six of the judges refused to follow him, among them being Judge Parker and Judge Bartlett, from whose opinions I have just read.

Mr. HERSEY. The gentleman does not wish to cite to this House dissenting opinions as authority for the position he is taking?

Mr. KOPP. The gentleman certainly would not say that a single judge, who put such a statement in his majority opinion, was authority on that point. The other judges dissented on that point, and certainly, when six judges do not concur, you would not say that that was the law, even though the other man, who wrote the majority opinion, so stated.

There seems to be an impression that the decisions in the child-labor cases in some way have a bearing upon this bill, and make it probable that this bill, if enacted into law, will not be held constitutional. An examination of the child-labor cases will clearly show to anyone that they have no application whatever in this case.

The first child-labor decision is found in Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251). An act had been passed by Congress prohibiting transportation in interstate commerce of goods made at a factory in which, within 30 days prior to their removal therefrom, children under 14 years of age had been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of 14 and 16 had been employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 7 p. m., or before the hour of 6 a. m. A bill was filed by a father upon his own behalf and as next friend for his two minor sons, who were within the age limit fixed in the law, to enjoin the enforcement of the act on the ground that it was invalid. The act was held unconstitutional because it invaded the powers reserved to the States. That decision can have no application to this bill, for this bill certainly does not invade the powers reserved to the States. The decision in Hammer against Dagenhart teems with defenses of the reserved powers of the States. I quote briefly from the opinion written by Justice Day:

> In interpreting the Constitution, it must never be forgotten that the Nation is made up of States to which are intrusted the powers of local government and to them and to the people the powers not expressly delegated to the National Government are reserved * * *. The power of the States to regulate their purely internal affairs by such laws as seem wise to the local authority is inherent and has never been surrendered to the general movement * * *. To sustain this statute * * * would sanction invasion by the Federal power of the control of a matter purely local in its character.

The court was divided. The majority held that the articles manufactured by child labor were not at the time a part of interstate commerce, but were simply intended for interstate commerce and for that reason subject only to local regulation. The majority, however, clearly recognized the complete control of Congress over interstate transportation.

Let me quote further from Justice Day:

> Over interstate transportation, or its incidents, the regulatory power of Congress is ample, but the protection of articles intended for interstate commerce is a matter of local regulation.

The dissenting opinion, written by the venerable Justice Holmes and joined in by three other justices, also clearly recognized the power of Congress over interstate commerce. Said Justice Holmes:

> Congress is given power to regulate such commerce in unqualified terms. It would not be argued to-day that the power to regulate does not include the power to prohibit. Regulation means the prohibition of something, and when interstate commerce is the matter to be regulated I can not doubt that the regulation may prohibit any part of such commerce that Congress sees fit to forbid.

What could be stronger than this language used by Justice Holmes?—

> When interstate commerce is the matter to be regulated I can not doubt that the regulation may prohibit any part of such commerce that Congress sees fit to forbid.

The opinion in the second child-labor case, known as the Child Labor Tax case (259 U. S. 20), was rendered in 1922, and was written by Chief Justice Taft. In order to avoid the constitutional question raised in the first child-labor case, a new law was enacted in 1919 imposing a tax on the employment of child labor.

Chief Justice Taft said that in this case, as in the previous child-labor case, Congress undertook to pass a law on a matter purely within the authority of the States, and therefore declared the law invalid. There was no suggestion in either of these child-labor cases that Congress could not make State laws applicable to interstate commerce; but both of the decisions were based upon an entirely different proposition, namely, that Congress could not take away powers from the States that were reserved to them by the Constitution.

In conclusion, I again ask you to bear in mind that the only effect of this bill will be to divest convict-made goods of their interstate character at an earlier period than would otherwise be the case. I again call your attention to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Rahrer case, in which that court, speaking through Chief Justice Fuller, said, unequivocally and without limitation:

> No reason is perceived why, if Congress chooses to provide that certain designated subjects of interstate commerce shall be governed by a rule which divests them of that character at an earlier period of time than would otherwise be the case, it is not within its competency to do so.

Congress can not reverse the Supreme Court; that body is the final authority on constitutional questions. It has spoken definitely and conclusively on the very matter now in issue here. Therefore I submit that this bill is constitutional and that it will be sustained if enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. KOPP. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill if cotton, corn, wheat, and other agricultural products are included in this bill?

Mr. KOPP. My opinion is that at the present time they are included.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. They are included?

Mr. KOPP. I think they are included.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. They are included, in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. KOPP. That is my judgment.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman mean that anything manufactured or produced by prison labor is included?

Mr. KOPP. I think it is a general law. That is my opinion about it.

Mr. MICHENER. It would make no difference whether it was cotton or binder twine?

Mr. KOPP. I think everything is included. That is my understanding of the law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER]. [Applause.]

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want, if possible, to bring the minds of the Members of the House back to a few elementary principles as to this bill, and I want to say at the outset that I am in hearty sympathy with the professed objects of this bill. I am in hearty sympathy with any principle that denies the right of the Federal Government through the commerce clause to ram down the throats of the people of any State a moral or economic principle which they disapprove.

I am perhaps the only man on this floor who voted for the Wilson bill in 1890, a perfectly just bill, in my judgment. It recognized the right principle. When a State had determined it did not want liquor in it, why should the commerce power of the Constitution compel them to take it?

Now, what is this bill? As I understand it, it says that any prison-made goods—I must give you the exact language—transported into any State or Territory of the United States and remaining therein—

Mark the words—remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage shall upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory.

What power has Congress to dictate to the States how property within the States shall be controlled and governed? Is not this power reserved to the States under the tenth amendment? Shall? That is, Congress proposes to compel the States. When and where did Congress acquire the power to compel a State?

Who made Congress the judge over the States, with power to dictate their internal policy as to all property within their boundaries? When an article is in commerce, from the moment it starts on its interstate journey until it is delivered to the consignee, Congress has all power over it; the State can not touch it; but the moment it drops into the lap of the consignee it becomes a part of the great mass of the property of the State which the State alone can control.

The principle has been well stated, as follows:

The prime distinction recognized in the leading case of Gibbons v. Ogden and the subsequent case of Brown v. Maryland shows that Congress has no power over things or persons except as subjects of foreign or interstate traffic or intercourse. When the thing or person is not in such commerce Congress has no power over it. Therefore, until the thing or person has this commercial quality the congressional power does not attach, and the State power is complete.

* * * * * * *

As long as the person or thing is in commercial transitu the State can not touch it, because it is under the regulations of Congress, and the State must so exercise its power in respect to these as not to interfere with the essential right of Congress to regulate commerce. But before transitus has once begun, or having begun has ceased, congressional power does not attach and the State power is exclusive. (Tucker on the Constitution, pp. 535–536.)

For example, if I ordered a carload of goods shipped to me at Lexington, Va., and the State levied a tax on them while on the track before delivery to me, the tax would be void, for the commerce power still attached to them; but if taxed by the State after their delivery to me it would be valid.

Therefore I say that this bill is one of two things—it is either merely declaratory of the law as it now exists, or it is an attempt by Congress to give a power to the States which they already possess. In either case the law would be useless. Read what Judge Marshall said in Brown against Maryland; the question there is so plain that the wayfaring man, though a fool, can understand it. He said that as long as Congress has control of an article in interstate commerce, of course, the State can not interfere with it; but the moment the journey is ended and it drops into the lap of the State, then Congress can not touch it. The State power then alone controls it.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KOPP] has said that some of the acts passed by the State legislatures to control convict-made goods have been declared unconstitutional. Certainly they have. Why? Evidently because such laws attempted to regulate commerce, which Congress alone can do. Look at the Child Labor case, which my friend from Iowa said a moment ago he did not think applicable to this case.

What was the Child Labor case? Congress enacted a law levying a tax of 10 cents a yard on cloth made in a mill where child labor under 14 was employed. What did our great Chief Justice say when he came to consider it? He said in effect that the custom of the courts is, and it has been for 100 years, not to look into the intention of the legislature in passing such an act.

When Congress passes a law putting a 10-cent tax a yard on cloth we must accept it that Congress did it as a revenue measure. But Chief Justice Taft said, in effect, with that common sense of his: "Everybody in the United States knows that this bill was passed to regulate child labor in the mills—everybody except this court—and we are presumed to accept the fact that Congress did it to raise revenue. Away with it! If everybody else in the country can see it, why can not we?" He saw it and kicked it out.

So it is here. Now, mark you, gentlemen, there was the power of taxation, which is an exclusive power of the Federal Government, but when that power is used, not for revenue but for the indirect purpose of reaching another end, that is a fraud on the Constitution. The argument of the court, in effect, was: "You are presenting a law on its face for taxation, and you know it is not for taxation, but to control child labor which is denied to Congress; and we will not recognize it. You know what it is for; you are trying to hide behind a worn-out presumption, which we refuse to follow any further, for we know what it is for, and we kick it out."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did not we do the same thing with the Harrison Narcotic Act?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes. Now, follow me: Here we have inspection laws, we have quarantine laws, commerce laws, and so forth.

A vessel comes up the harbor and a State officer goes out on a tug and stops that great vessel. What for? Is not that vessel engaged in interstate commerce? Yes. Is not that an exclusive power of the Federal Government? Yes. Why, then, does this little State officer come in here and stop the commercial power of the Federal Government? What do you mean by coming in here, the captain says; you are interfering with commerce. The State officer says, "I am not interfering with commerce; I am simply out here to see that you shall bring rightful commerce and not disease into our port." The power to carry on commerce is not a power to bring disease to a port, and the quarantine power which belongs to the State is a help to commerce and not a hindrance. It helps rightful commerce and protects the port from disease.

Chief Justice Marshall says in Gibbons against Ogden:

It is no objection to the existence of distinct, substantive powers that in their application they bear upon the same subject. The same bale of goods * * * that may be the subject of commercial regulation may also be the vehicle of disease. And the health laws that require them to be stopped and ventilated are no more intended as regulations on commerce than the laws which permit their importation are intended to inoculate the community with disease.

And further:

The two powers are made to consist by restraining the State, under color of quarantine, from regulating rightful commerce, and restraining Congress, under color of commerce, from regulating the unlawful importation of disease. (Tucker on the Constitution, p. 538.)

Now, the gentleman who just preceded me said that some State laws preventing the sale of convict-made goods had been declared unconstitutional. Why? I will tell you why. Just as the Federal Government can not attempt to regulate child labor, a State function under the taxing power of the Government, so the States, to carry out their own laws and their own desires, can not attempt to regulate interstate commerce in passing a State law. If the State passes a law interfering with interstate commerce, of course the courts, as they ought to do, will declare it unconstitutional.

So, gentlemen, just in a word—for I never saw the bill until this morning, and I started out with the idea that I was going to vote for it until I saw what it was—in my judgment, this bill is nothing more than the law of the land to-day. If it is not that, then it is a spurious attempt upon the part of Congress to compel the States to do what they now alone have the power to do, or an attempt by Congress to give power to the States, from whom all power originally came to Congress.

Congress under its power to regulate commerce has passed laws excluding certain articles from such commerce which might be deleterious to health or morals. This has been approved by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is too clear for argument that the power of Congress over these subjects or articles terminates when the subject or article arrives at its destination. Though immoral or unhealthy and hurtful to the people, when once it lands in a State the power of Congress over it ceases entirely and its control pasess to the State. And while the carrying of convict-made goods in interstate commerce may be the subject of legislation by Congress, and Congress alone, the laws which control such property after its arival in the State are not for Congress to determine, but rest solely with the State, subject only to this condition, that such State law must not in its control and disposition of such property in any way interfere with or attempt to regulate commerce. When the property lands at its destination in the State two species of State laws may attach to them. First, the police power of the State, and second, the powers given by the tenth amendment:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited to it by the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Now, this bill before us is framed practically in the exact language of the Wilson bill, which became a law August 8, 1890, except that this bill says that the convict-made goods—

upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory shall be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods, wares, and merchandise had been manufactured, produced, or mined in such State or Territory—

While the Wilson law declares that liquor transported by interstate commerce into a State—shall be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police power to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory.

Why the difference in the two bills? It is quite apparent that the author of the bill was afraid that such convict-made goods would not come under the definition of the police power of the State, which embraces all that may affect the health, the morality, or the safety of the people, and chose to let it rest under the pervasive power of the tenth amendment, which embraced every other power which the State could have. The police power, which has been treated by the court in many cases [for a consideration of this question, I beg to refer to "Limitations on the Treaty-Making Power" (p. 284 etc.), by H. ST. GEORGE TUCKER] is confined in those decisions to questions affecting the health, the morality, and the safety of the people of a State; and since the proponents of this bill, while following the language of the Wilson liquor law of August 8, 1890, have declined to follow it by allowing the convict-made goods to be subject to the police power of the State, they must have intended to let it rest under the general powers of the tenth amendment; and this was doubtlessly done because the language of the court in the child-labor cases indicated quite clearly that the purity, cleanliness, and innocence of an article could not be affected by the hand that made it. The court in many cases has recognized that the police power of the State does not yield to the supreme power of commerce. Chief Justice Fuller in the case of In re Rahrer, the Wilson liquor case, 140 U. S. Reports, 554, opens his opinion with the declaration of certain principles which have governed the court on this subject, and says:

And this court has uniformly recognized State legislation, legitimately for police purposes, as not in the sense of the Constitution necessarily infringing upon any right which has been confided expressly or by implication to the National Government.

And, following that view, Justice White, in the case of Compagnie Française de Navigation v. State Board of Health (186 U. S. 394), referring to a French vessel, the Britannia, sailing from France to New Orleans under a treaty providing that if any vessel should leave France with a clean bill of health, and no disease had broken out on the voyage, it would have a right to enter any port of the United States immediately. The Britannia was stopped by a quarantine officer at New Orleans.

Justice White said:

In other words, the treaty was made subject to the enactment of such health laws as the local conditions might evoke, not paramount to them. Especially where the restriction imposed upon the vessel is based, not upon the conditions existing at the port of departure, but upon the presence of an infectious or contagious malady at the port of arrival within the United States.

Other cases in the reference above uphold this doctrine. So that this bill leaves the power of the State to control convict-made goods when they arrive within the borders under the powers reserved to it under the tenth amendment.

Now, the tenth amendment reserves to the States every power not granted. But the power to regulate commerce has been granted to Congress, and that is a supreme power; and therefore if the State in passing a law to control these goods interferes with interstate commerce it is invalid, because the language of the amendment says that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution rests with the States; but a power that has been delegated by the Constitution to Congress is supreme over the States. So that a State law passed in reference to such goods, if it interferes with any grant of power to Congress, is invalid; and the discussion on this bill and the hearings thereon show quite clearly that it is an attempt to violate that principle which has been recognized from the foundation of the Government, and gives to the States the power to nullify the interstate-commerce power of Congress. On page 255 of the hearings on this bill the brilliant and able Representative from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN] says that if this bill becomes a law—we are not taking a power away from the State. On the contrary, we are conferring power upon the State—it is an enabling act—permitting the State to do something which it now can not do.

As it can not now interfere with interstate commerce the inference is irresistible that the object of this bill is to set up that right in the States. Where, in all the records of the Constitution or history, do we find any power given to Congress to endow a State with any such power?

Let us be not deceived. I know nothing about the economics of this question. I do know about the principles at the bottom of it. I believe we will make a great mistake if this bill is passed. It is useless or unconstitutional. It is simply vox et præterea nihil. [Applause.]

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I shall not attempt to go into the constitutionality of this bill except to state that it seems to me that the Wilson Act, which was upheld by the Supreme Court and which is quoted by the chairman, is clearly analogous to this bill. In that case the Supreme Court did not say in specific language that they were dealing with intoxicating liquors. They merely laid down the power of Congress to divest commerce of its interstate character at any point at which Congress might see fit or at any period of time at which it might see fit to do so.

I shall devote myself to speaking in connection with the evils the people of the United States and of the States endure as a result of convict-made goods coming into the various States. In the State of Massachusetts convict-made goods are permitted only in State use. They are used in the State institutions. If you do not pass this bill then Massachusetts or Ohio or New York or any other State which does not permit their convict-made goods to be sold in other States can not pass a law providing that no convict-made goods shall be sold in their own State without having convict-made goods dumped upon them as a result of interstate commerce regulations. It will leave the State of Massachusetts and these other States with no recourse whatever. These goods can be falsely branded as was illustrated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. In some instances they put on the name "Yankee shirts," or "United States goods," and all sorts of misleading brands on the goods. In my district, the seventh Massachusetts, in the city of Lynn, my home city, we manufacture mostly shoes. The General Electric Co. has works there, but the main product is shoes. The main product of the city of Lawrence, in my district, is textiles; we have large mills there; and there remains one more city in the district, the city of Peabody, where we have the manufacture of leather. Mine is a great industrial district, and other Congressmen have the same sort of districts.

You can see what prison-made goods of that character mean to my district, to say nothing of the city of St. Louis or of Rochester or other cities that manufacture similar goods. Convict-made goods, shoes, textiles, leather can be shipped into the State of Massachusetts now and sold at lower prices than can the shoes and textiles and the leather goods made in Lawrence, Lynn, and Peabody, in my district, and the free labor and the manufacturers in that district have to suffer greatly thereby.

I do not believe in keeping the prisoners in the penitentiaries idle. We had thorough hearings on this bill. Many wardens of almost all the States came before us, and when I had the opportunity the first question I asked of each warden was what they made in their penitentiaries. Almost invariably the first thing they mentioned was shoes, then textiles, then shirts, then brooms, and then on to different articles of merchandise. I do not believe that the free labor in my district or in your district should be put into competition with convict labor. I believe the citizens of Detroit, or Chicago, or St. Louis, or New Orleans, or Boston, or any other city who go in to buy shoes or shirts or clothes should know where they are made. I do not believe they should be misled by a brand saying that the goods came from Chicago when they were in fact made in some State penitentiary. I believe the people should know what they are buying and where the goods come from. I believe that the labor of the United States, the free workers, the men and women who go into the factories to manufacture shoes and textiles and leather and brooms, or any other product, are entitled to protection from the United States Congress against this invasion of their rights by prison-made labor. I do not believe the prisoners should be kept in idleness. Some of the wardens said that if the men were left in a prison without anything to do they would go insane. I do not doubt that at all. I believe they would. But as I told one gentleman at the time, the brooding of a man who was in prison because he was a murderer or a burglar or a thief did not concern me nearly as much as the brooding of a man from my district with nine children who is put out of work by the man in the prison. [Applause.]

In the Federal penitentiaries they have devised a scheme whereby they will diversify their industries. They will make a little of this and a little of that, and that will not interfere with free labor outside. Under the Government these goods being made will be used by the United States Government.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The State of Massachusetts, which the gentleman has the honor to represent, has a law regulating the sale of convict-made goods.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. You have not had any of these disastrous results in your State because you regulate it, have you?

Mr. CONNERY. No; we have not. We are able to take care of anything made by our convicts.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The products of your prison labor are shoes, which you sell to the schools, do I understand?

Mr. CONNERY. In the penitentiaries of Massachusetts they have diversified the industries and make just a few shoes, a few shirts, a few brooms, and a few of all different articles. One of the objections I have to the present situation is because by convict-made goods being shipped into Massachusetts my particular district suffers greatly by competition in textiles, shoes, and leather manufactured by convicts.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. What I have in mind is this: If the persons who buy the prison-made goods did not buy them, they would buy other goods, would they not? They would buy goods made by free labor.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Then you have thereby robbed free labor of the market they would supply with these products.

Mr. CONNERY. I will say to the gentleman that in Massachusetts, when a free laborer goes into a shoe store to buy shoes or anything else, he knows they are the products of prison labor, and, if so, he will not buy them. There are 35 different things they make, but they do not interfere with the free labor of Massachusetts, and Massachusetts does not distribute the prison-made goods made in her prisons into other States. When you dump prison-made goods made in the 47 other States into the State of Massachusetts we are greatly injured.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Massachusetts does not dump its goods into any particular place?

Mr. CONNERY. No. They do not want to interfere with free labor.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Would it be possible for a small State like Vermont, for example, to diversify its prison industries, as is done in the case of Massachusetts?

Mr. CONNERY. I think so.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Your view is that if only one thing were made it would interfere with free labor?

Mr. CONNERY. There is nothing to prevent any State from buying the convict goods of Vermont, if that State wishes to do so. But every State should have self-protection if they do not want these goods dumped on them.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Do you not think it would be cheaper for a State the size of Vermont to support its prison inmates in idleness than to diversify the products made? The expense for machinery and other equipment would be excessive in proportion to the small amount of goods turned out. I see the statement is made in the committee's report that only one-half of 1 per cent of the shoes made in the United States are made in prisons. The gentleman from Massachusetts must know that is a very small amount, too small to create much competition with free labor. The State of Vermont makes a few shoes, and buys from Massachusetts and other States a lot of products, including clothing and other things, for the use of its prisoners and for the inmates of its other institutions. It is my opinion that it buys far more of the products of free labor than it sells of the products of its prison labor.

Mr. CONNERY. I think Vermont could use its prison-made goods itself without shipping them out of the State.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Under our conditions I believe it would be an economic impossibility.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. The State may or may not prevent the sale of prison-made goods therein?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. I wanted to ask another question. I think it is quite important to ascertain what is contemplated as to the extent to which it would go. Assuming that this bill is passed, and assuming, for instance, that my State of North Dakota would pass just as broad an act as possible under the enabling act, would it be possible for my State to pass an act which would prevent residents of my State from ordering, we will say, a binder made by the inmates of the penitentiary in the State of Minnesota and have that binder shipped from Minnesota into North Dakota in interstate commerce?

Mr. CONNERY. I doubt if your State could make such a provision, but your State could provide that all prison-made goods made in your State could be used in the State institutions or otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. KOPP. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. BURTNESS. I was wondering if we could go further than that and say that not only shall no prison-made goods be sold in a State, but we can prevent the importation into the State of prison-made goods made in other States. Would this prevent the importation of prison-made goods from a penitentiary in another State?

Mr. CONNERY. I doubt if they could pass such legislation.

Mr. BURTNESS. It is purely a legal question.

Mr. CONNERY. In reference to what I said about the decision of the Supreme Court, it seems to me that what the court said in the Wilson bill case is decisive and clearly analogous to this bill. The court said:

> No reason is perceived why, if Congress chooses to provide that certain designated subjects of interstate commerce shall be governed by a rule which divests them of that character at an earlier period of time than would otherwise be the case, it is not within its competency to do so.

It seems to me that the Supreme Court of the United States in that decision laid down the constitutionality of this bill.

Mr. GIBSON. As I understand, the Congress could divest any product of that right?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman recognizes the distinction between the Wilson bill and this bill, does he not?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, may I have two minutes more?

Mr. KOPP. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. GIBSON. I say, does not the gentleman recognize a distinction between the Wilson case and this proposed law?

Mr. CONNERY. I do; but I do not believe the Supreme Court laid down any principle there that is opposed to the principle of this bill. We say Congress has this power because it has the police power. I said if Congress wanted to divest anything of its interstate character at an earlier period of time we could do it.

Mr. GIBSON. This proposes a method of production rather than commerce.

Mr. CONNERY. It fixes the time at which prison-made merchandise can be divested of the right of interstate commerce.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. In a State like mine, where they work prison farms, and work these farms in a reasonable way, would it not help us in the conduct of that system if you passed this bill?

Mr. CONNERY. The Department of Justice is studying conditions in the Federal penitentiaries on that very problem.

Mr. BUSBY. You say these shoes made in your State are turned over to the children and are used in the schools?

Mr. CONNERY. No. I did not say that they were used by children in the schools. There are different articles manufactured by the prisons such as ink, and so forth, which, under the law, must be bought from the State institutions; but of course they would not allow prison-made shoes to be sold to children. That would be absurd in such a great free-labor State as Massachusetts.

Mr. BUSBY. So in Massachusetts you have no system except to close access to your prison labor and its products?

Mr. CONNERY. We have a wonderful system in Massachusetts and we do not dump our convict-made goods on other States.

Mr. BUSBY. You do not work your prisoners on farms, do you?

Mr. CONNERY. We have some working on farms; yes.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentlemen who have been discussing this bill and who are in favor of it fail to appreciate or, at least, to express what seems to me to be an undeniable fact, and that is the mere provision that the prisons shall make goods only for State use does not take them out of competition with free labor. It is stated as a fact in favor of the Federal law that in the brick works at a Federal prison which we recently provided for, all the bricks produced should be used only in Federal works. It is perfectly obvious that all those bricks which are made in the Federal prisons prevent the use and sale of an exactly equal number of other bricks which would be made by free labor. The same is true in the other institutions, that the goods they make for State use go into use and fill a void which otherwise would be filled by free labor.

All those who favor the bill agree that it would be absolutely inhuman to keep prisoners without work. Some of us have been in prisons where we have seen men sitting in cells without work, and more miserable and dejected beings can not be conceived; and it is true that the only result of such treatment is to produce insanity.

Now, if we are going to allow these prisoners to work, and if we are going to have any idea of reformation in the treatment of prisoners, which has been making progress in the last generation, then it appears to me it is only fair—and it does not increase competition on the whole—to use these prisoners in an efficient and businesslike way; that is to say, you must have industries in the prisons which will fit these men to go into similar industries when they go out. And the prisoners must work under conditions similar to those in industry.

Now, gentlemen have spoken about the Mississippi prisoners making money for the State on farms. In Connecticut the prisoners are not under the control of any contractor. It is true they do make contracts for the prison labor, but the prisoners are always under the merciful control of the prison authorities. They do get wages and while they are in the prison they earn wages which are appreciable. The gentleman has spoken about the free man with eight children. Well, of course, a prisoner can have eight children as well as a free man, and his wife and his children are just as innocent as the wife and eight children of a free laborer. So it is quite merciful and beneficial to society to give prisoners wages so that they can help support their families while they are in prison and then when they go out they are handed a fund saved from their wages so they are not compelled to go on the streets and from despair drift again into crime.

I think it is a fact that the net cost of the goods made in Connecticut prisons is little less than relatively equal to goods made with free labor.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman does not seriously contend that the cost of manufacturing goods in prisons is equal to that on the outside?

Mr. MERRITT. I do seriously contend substantially that in relation to the products of the Connecticut prisons.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not know what arrangements you have in Connecticut, but that is not true in any other State I know of.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. Do you have the contract system in your State?

Mr. MERRITT. Not in the sense that the contractors work the prisoners.

Mr. CARSS. Do they take the products of the prisoners?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. If that labor costs as much as free labor, what object is there in a person contracting to employ that labor?

Mr. MERRITT. Well, of course, he gets a regular supply of labor and the goods are a low grade of goods. It may be that the first cost is relatively somewhat less.

Mr. CARSS. Then it is not true that the wages paid are equal to those paid to free labor?

Mr. BRIGHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Is it not true that this labor is somewhat inefficient and that prisoners have to come and learn their trade, so that the turnover of labor is very great. Therefore, while the price is relatively small, nevertheless the labor cost is great?

Mr. MERRITT. I think the unit cost is not very different in either case.

Now, another point that has been raised here I think is really the fundamental point. Aside from the constitutional point, which I shall not argue, it appears to me that this proposed legislation is of a type which unfortunately has grown upon the Congress and upon the country. I do not deny that as to prison-made goods in many of the States there are some evils, which I should be glad to see corrected, but they should be corrected, just as the Mississippi case has been corrected, by the States themselves.

The great difficulty nowadays is that, when any evil appears in any part of the country, those who want change, or what they call reform, come to Congress at once and want to correct the entire evil with one law, which, of course, they can not do. The effect of this law, if it is passed, is that, in attempting to cure certain evils which are claimed to exist, it will produce a great many other evils which are worse, but which are not foreseen.

I do not myself perceive why, if it is competent for Congress to permit one State by legislation to prevent the entrance within its borders and remaining there for sale of prison-made goods, it is not also competent, as has already been suggested, to pass a law forbidding goods to come into that State and be sold which are made by colored people, or by union labor, or made in a wooden house because it might burn up, or made in a stone house for some other reason, neither do I see why it would not be entirely possible to destroy the whole patent system of the United States. We will suppose, as has often happened in the history of this country, that one class of goods which has wide distribution is supplanted by some improved article which is patented. Now, a State perceives that its industry is being threatened by this improved article and the State says, "We can not stand this competition and therefore we will legislate so that goods made in accordance with a certain patent shall not be sold in this State." I do not see any difference between this and the legislation here proposed.

Mr. CROSSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I will.

Mr. CROSSER. Does not the gentleman think that, instead of violating the spirit of the doctrine of State rights, this really is going right along with it when it says the State may regulate the proposition as it sees fit?

Mr. MERRITT. I do not think it is in accord with the doctrine of State rights, but, on the contrary, I think it destroys constitutional rights of property and contravenes the basis of the Constitution that trade shall be free among the various States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COMBS].

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, due to the fact that our hearings on this bill were both exhaustive and lengthy, we have available a mass of data which perhaps it would have been well for the House to have studied at greater length. In view of the impossibility of this, however, in answer to the gentleman from Connecticut, I want briefly to give the House some indication of the difference between the cost of prison-made and free-labor-produced commodities. I believe the gentleman stated that the unit cost was approximately the same in the case of the two different types of manufactured goods.

Mr. MERRITT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was only talking about such goods made in Connecticut.

Mr. COMBS. In Connecticut? Accepting the gentleman's correction, I still feel that it is important that we know approximately what the laborers are getting in the penitentiaries for the work which they do.

In the average shoe factory run by a contractor under the lease system, the convict is paid 5 or 6 cents a pair. He receives for a week's work a sum rarely in excess of $1.90. Necessarily, the margin between this $1.90 and the price which would be paid a free laborer is either the contractor's artificial margin of profit or the zone in the range of which he can safely depress his prices and stifle competition from independent or free-labor sources. In the case of shirt manufacturing, I believe, the figures show the cost of prison labor to be approximately one-third of that of free labor.

So it is obvious that throughout the country wherever cheap work clothing is manufactured the effect of the prison-contract system has been virtually to destroy the market in those communities which have experienced this depressive effect.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it not a complete answer to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] that if it would cost as much to manufacture in prison contractors would not go to the penitentiaries to manufacture their goods?

Mr. COMBS. Why, of course, that is perfectly obvious. They bear no part of the overhead expense, they pay no rent, and they receive the labor of the convicts for sums usually less than $2 a week.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. If the States would correct their system of leasing labor to contractors, would that not reach the objection that is trying to be reached by this bill?

Mr. COMBS. Not entirely, sir; it would in a measure.

Mr. BUSBY. The burden of the complaint is that this thing goes on of leasing convict labor to contractors by the State authorities.

Mr. COMBS. Of course, the most pernicious feature of our present system that this bill is aimed to correct is the leasing or the contract system, but that is not by any means the sum total of the fault of the present sysem.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GREENWOOD. And since some States will not correct that system, this law prevents those States from dumping their goods into other States that will do it.

Mr. COMBS. Yes. One State, I believe the State of Indiana, actually exports and sends into other States 85 per cent of its convict-made goods.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Indiana?

Mr. COMBS. I believe that is the State.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. If it is true that Indiana is at fault, then I am willing to correct the situation in Indiana the same as in any other State.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the average wage paid convict labor is only $2 a week?

Mr. COMBS. That is true in a number of the States, in the shoe manufacturing divisions.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. That is ridiculous.

Mr. COMBS. Five and six cents a pair.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. That is worse than slave labor.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Let me add, however, that Indiana does not contract its prison labor.

Mr. COMBS. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. COMBS. It has been said that it is impossible merely by changing the occupation or the nature of the work in which these men are employed to take them out of competition with free labor.

Mr. BUSBY. If cotton is produced by convict labor in Mississippi and is shipped into Massachusetts, it becomes merchandise of interstate commerce and would be subject to the same regulation that pertains to other articles?

Mr. COMBS. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. And the laws in relation to convict labor would not cure the situation you are trying to cure after all.

Mr. COMBS. I think it would, for it has been repeatedly stated—and I believe with some logic—that agricultural products do not come in the classification of goods, wares, and merchandise.

Mr. FOSS. What object would Massachusetts have in shutting cotton out?

Mr. BUSBY. That is what I want to know, but under the bill they are doing it.

Mr. COMBS. It is obvious if convicts are to be employed in any productive work they will be brought into competition with free labor, but this bill seeks to limit them, in the State-use system, to a restricted and noncompetitive market, the price levels of which will not affect the prevailing price levels on the open market.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have for a long time been in favor of legislation to accomplish the purpose which this bill is intended to accomplish. Years ago, when I first came to Congress, I was on the Labor Committee. Our committee started legislation of this kind, and, if I remember correctly, reported a bill favorably to Congress. I do not now remember what disposition was made of it.

I wish the committee in considering the subject had brought in a bill in a somewhat different form from that now presented to the House. I am afraid that there may be something in the argument presented by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], judging by the phraseology of the bill. It says that all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, and so forth. by convicts or prisoners transported into any State or Territory in the United States and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage shall upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory.

What is meant by "upon delivery"? Does that mean after delivery? If it does, then it seems to me that such goods would be subject to the laws of the State anyway and this bill would not have any effect. I do not know what construction the courts would place upon the word "upon," as used in the act.

I said that I wished the legislation had taken a somewhat different form, and I will tell you why. I have for a number of years been giving a great deal of study to a Federal blue sky law—that is, a law of the Federal Government to prevent the sale of fraudulent securities—fraudulent stocks and bonds—through the agency of the interstate commerce.

Forty-six States of the Union have passed laws to protect their own citizens against the sale of fraudulent and worthless securities. Most of these laws are effective—they protect their citizens in a way, and yet through the channels of interstate commerce the State laws are being evaded and nullified by dishonest promoters who sell their worthless securities through the channels of interstate commerce. States which have fraudulent securities laws appeal to Congress to pass some legislation to prevent the agencies of interstate commerce, which are exclusively under Federal control, being used to nullify the State laws. So I have had before Congress for a number of years a bill which provides about as follows:

That it shall be unlawful to send through the agencies of interstate commerce from one State into another State any security for sale which can not lawfully be sold in that State.

Now, I studied the constitutional questions involved in such legislation and consulted a great many authorities, and I became convinced that that kind of a law is constitutional. In other words where a security is unlawful in one State, where it can not be lawfully sold because not qualified under the laws of that State, Congress can exercise its constitutional power to regulate commerce and forbid the transportation of such a security through interstate commerce into that State.

If this legislation had taken that form it seems to me that it would have been effective, and there would have been no question about its constitutionality. That was what the Webb-Kenyon Act did, and we have passed other similar laws. Congress can, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, prevent the transportation of any article from one State into another State for sale in such State, if such sale would be unlawful therein; and it would make no difference whether the State law was passed in the exercise of the State's police power, or of any other proper public policy.

Mr. BUSBY. Would not that be based upon the same reason that all of the decisions read by the chairman of the committee were based on; that is, the police power of the State to be used against worthless securities and against the sale of intoxicating liquors?

Mr. DENISON. I take it that each State has the right to pass such legislation as it may wish to protect its own citizens either against the sale of fraudulent securities or against the sale of prison-made goods. That is a question of police power and public policy.

Mr. BUSBY. Is there anything in the prison-made goods that would make them unwholesome or injurious to health or morals of the community?

Mr. DENISON. No; I do not think so; but I think that any State as a matter of its own public policy has a right, if it wants to, to pass a law to protect its citizens against the sale of prison-made goods within its own borders. Each State has full power to deal as it may choose with intrastate sales of prison-made goods.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman thinks the State has that power?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Can Congress confer that power on the States?

Mr. DENISON. No; I think that is a power that is inherent in the State.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The State has reserved that power to itself.

Mr. DENISON. Yes. Let us take as an illustration the State of Virginia. If the legislature of that State thinks its own sound public policy, whatever its reasons may be, demands that prison-made goods made within the State be not sold within the State in competition with goods made by free labor, I think the State has the right to pass that kind of a law. If the State adopts that policy and passes such a law to protect its citizens against the sale of prison-made goods, made within the State itself, then Congress may very well come to the aid of that State, to the extent of saying that, since the State has adopted that policy, Congress will not permit its agencies of interstate commerce to be used to violate that State policy and nullify that State's law. I think we can properly forbid the shipping of prison-made goods from one State into another State to be sold contrary to the law of that State.

I intend to vote for this bill because I think its purpose is wise and proper. But I think it would have been more effective and subject to less criticism if it had been reported in the form I have suggested.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS].

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am in favor of this legislation. I attended all of the hearings of the committee and had something to do with examining the witnesses. I have been familiar with legislation of this sort for some time. I happen to represent a district from a State that has practically solved the prison-labor problem. We have no contract labor in Minnesota, we have no men sitting idle in prison houses going insane because they are not employed. We manufactured, I think, last year, 22,000,000 pounds of binder twine, and many million dollars' worth of agricultural implements. This binder twine is shipped into the different States and sold, but it is sold in conformity with the laws of those States, whatever they may be. We stamp our machinery and castings with the prison label and with a stencil put the prison label on the woodwork. We label all of our binding twine, and yet right in Minnesota where our law does not permit prison-made goods to be sold unless labeled prison-made goods, millions of dollars of prison-made goods are coming in and are being dumped upon the people of that State, who are opposed to the sale of these goods, and we are not able to protect ourselves. I think the State of Minnesota has a right to protect itself. I believe that is good old State-rights doctrine. I do not see how you gentlemen on the Democratic side can vote against this bill, if you believe in that.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARSS. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. In how many States are convict-made goods manufactured and sold in interstate commerce and in competition with free labor?

Mr. CARSS. I have not the figures, but in a great many States.

Mr. SMITH. Suppose these surrounding States where you are selling the 22,000,000 pounds of binder twine were to pass a law to prohibit prison-made goods going into those States where it is now being sold?

Mr. CARSS. If the people of those States saw fit to pass a law of that kind to prohibit prison-made goods coming into their territory, I think they would have that right.

Mr. SMITH. Then your people would not be able to sell that great quantity of binder twine?

Mr. CARSS. No. The sentiment against the sale of prison-made goods has not developed to the extent that they bar these goods. Some of the gentlemen think the farmers are afraid, if this legislation is passed, that it will prevent binder twine and farm machinery from being shipped into their States. I say to you that the legislatures of the agricultural States are dominated by the farmers, and that they are not going to be foolish enough to pass any laws which will lay themselves open to being compelled to pay monopolistic prices for goods. In other words, they will not injure themselves by any act of their own legislatures.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Does the gentleman sell this binder twine for less than twine made by free labor?

Mr. CARSS. A very little lower, if any; in fact, I think sometimes our prices have been a little higher, owing to the superior quality of our binding twine, and we are able to hold the market.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is it not true that anything made by prison labor, no matter where you sell it, will compete with free labor?

Mr. CARSS. Absolutely. I do not think any sensible man will contend that you can employ prisoners in the penitentiary without coming into competition with some kind of free labor. I wish it were possible to devise a plan to prevent this, but unfortunately there is none. The principal objection to the prison-contract system is that while the amount is small, it comes into competition with just a few industries. For instance, take the broom-making industry. It is about the only thing that poor blind people can engage in.

That is being ruined by this unfair competition from the prison.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARSS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Is it true that up in the Stillwater Penitentiary, in order to meet the demand for the goods manufactured at that institution, you have to employ free labor to cooperate with the convict labor in making the goods?

Mr. CARSS. Yes. And I want to say to you that we pay wages in Minnesota, and we have welfare organizations there that make an investigation of the prisoners' families, and we do not pay the families simply 7 or 8 or 10 cents a day, but as high as $1.20 is paid, and in some cases $60 per month for the support of the prisoners' families.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You guarantee them their employment? In other words, the fellow in jail is sure of employment anyway?

Mr. CARSS. Yes. But the fellow employed in a shoe factory that is shut down and is out of a job on account of unfair competition of prison labor is liable to be forced to commit a crime in order to procure the necessities of life for his family.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In order to get a job?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARSS. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What percentage of shoes is made by prison labor?

Mr. CARSS. They claim one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. BRIGHAM. The report says 6.47 per cent of the twine is made by prison labor.

Mr. CARSS. It does not make any difference what the percentage is; it is the principle involved.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CLAGUE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the State of Minnesota does not have a contract-labor system. That system was abolished many years ago. We manufacture in our State prison at Stillwater, Minn., some twine and farm machinery. Twine has been manufactured in our prison for the past 30 years and farm machinery for 18 years.

The gentleman from Minnesota who preceded me [Mr. CARSS] has stated that we pay our convicts. This is true. Every convict in our State prison receives pay, the lowest being 25 cents per day, and the highest $1.30 per day. The average is 50 cents per day. If a prisoner who has a family comes to our State prison, 75 per cent of his pay is sent to the family, and 25 per cent is retained by the prisoner, which he can use as he sees fit. If the prisoner has a family of several children, oftentimes more than 75 per cent of his pay is given to his family. The amount paid to families of prisoners ranges from $25 to $60 per month, depending on financial condition of the family, and the number of children. This is done for the purpose of keeping the family together, supporting the wife, and educating the children.

Our State prison is managed by a warden governed by the State board of control. So far as I have been able to learn, there is never any dispute in our State with federations of labor over the fact that our prisoners are allowed to make binding twine and farm machinery. Our State board of control and warden have managed our prison to the entire satisfaction of our State legislature and the people of our State. I have had a personal knowledge concerning the management of our prison for more than 25 years last past, and during the past 15 years I have never heard a complaint regarding our State prison management.

The State board of control and our prison warden have given much study to the bill now before us, and they feel that if it is passed it will be of great injury to our twine plant and farm-machinery plant. I dare say that the great majority of the farmers in our State are opposed to this legislation.

Mr. CARSS. I do not think they understand it.

Mr. CLAGUE. I know the farmers of my State, and I know that they have been able to secure prison twine at from 1 to 2 or more cents per pound cheaper than twine sold by the trusts, and it is of a good quality. Prison-made binders are sold for about $20 less than those made by other plants. The twine is sold direct to farmers; there are no agents' commissions. Our prison manufactures besides binders, mowers, rakes, and some trucks. The farm machinery is sold through agents appointed by the State board of control. During the past five years, 1923 to 1927, prison-made farm machinery has been sold in the amount of $1,983,615.65. Twine has been sold amounting to $10,941,982.28. Seventy-six and twenty-four one-hundredths per cent of this total amount has been sold to farmers residing in the State of Minnesota, and 23.76 per cent to farmers residing outside of Minnesota. The estimated saving to the farmers of our State who have purchased prison-made farm machinery and twine for the past five years is $3,032,772.80. The twine annually manufactured amounts to about 20,000,000 pounds, and about 3,000 binders, about 3,000 mowers, and the same number of hay rakes. These goods are sold in the State of Minnesota first, and the surplus in the adjoining States—North Dakota, South Dakota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, and Montana. Every prisoner is given some kind of employment, and we also employ in our prison a large number of outside workmen. These men are all paid union wages, and even better than union wages, as they are allowed two weeks' vacation each year with pay. We have tried to give our prisoners labor which comes as little as possible in conflict with union labor.

Mr. CARSS. This bill is not alone for union labor. It is for all labor. I do not like anybody to get the impression that it is for union labor only. I represent not only union labor, but all labor.

Mr. CLAGUE. I did not mean to infer just union labor. I refer to all labor. Of course, anything that is done around a prison must to a certain extent come in contact with free labor. You can not help that. Our State board of control and prison authorities who have given much study to this bill are afraid that if it is passed it will be an entering wedge that will eventually destroy our twine plant and farm-machinery plant, and will eventually take away the right to give employment to our prisoners.

I think my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS] will agree with me that federated labor and labor generally in our State has never had any complaint to make with the way our prison has been managed.

Mr. CARSS. Absolutely; and if the other States had been as progressive as we have been we would not have had this bill before us in the House to-day.

Mr. CLAGUE. I think that is true. Personally, I am bitterly opposed to the contract system which is now carried on in some States. We do not allow that in our State, and I do not know of any prison contract-system goods being shipped into our State, though there may be some.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. Is there anything in this bill that will tend to injure the farmer, or is it the fear of something following in the wake of this bill?

Mr. CLAGUE. As the bill is drawn, it is more in the wake.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I have a complaint from one of my manufacturers about the Government setting up these prison manufacturing plants itself; for instance, the manufacture of iron. What has been done about the manufacture of iron, and I want to ask the gentleman what you folks who have been looking after this thing have done about the Government of the United States?

Mr. CLAGUE. Our prison labor, as stated, is engaged in the manufacture of twine and farm machinery.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. CLAGUE. We do not manufacture iron in our prison. The prisoners in our State work in the making of such things as are made by the trusts; such as twine and some farm machinery, and so far as I know we have never had a single complaint from any labor organizations. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] has stated that the prisoners in their State manufacture about 35 different kinds of articles, and these are sold to various public institutions in their State, including public schools. Certainly this comes more in competition with free labor than the manufacture of twine and farm machinery in our State.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and some other Members have advocated that the prisoners be worked by the State in the construction and building of public highways. The State of Minnesota has one of the finest highway systems in the Union, and we are spending upward of $15,000,000 per year in the improvement of our roads, and this money is paid out entirely to free labor. I am sure that if we employed our convicts upon our public highways in our Northwestern States it would be a greater injury to free labor than employing them as we now do in the manufacture of twine, binders, mowers, and rakes.

The prisoners and all labor employed in our Minnesota prison work eight hours per day. During the past 15 years the prison has been wholly self-sustaining, and our legislature and State has had to appropriate no money whatever either for the construction of new buildings or machinery or for any other expenses in carrying on the prison. In my opinion, the manufacture of twine, mowers, binders, and rakes as carried on by our prison comes much less in competition with free labor than the manufacture of other articles. I am absolutely opposed to the contract system in any form. The manufacture of twine and farm machinery in our State has been a means of saving millions of dollars for the farmers of the Northwest, and I do not want to see any legislation passed at this time that will prohibit the carrying on of this industry, as I believe it comes less in competition with free labor in the Northwestern States than the manufacture of any other articles.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the Chair how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has 24 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Mississippi has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH].

Mr. WELCH of California. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, California has adopted the "State use" plan in reference to prison-made goods. We concluded it was an injustice to legitimate industries and to free labor employed therein to meet the competition of prison labor. California in one of her prisons employs her prisoners in the manufacture of furniture that is used in State institutions, and in the manufacture of hemp and jute sacks which are sold directly to the farmer by the prison authorities. In the other penal institution prisoners are employed quarrying granite and crushing rock for use by our State highway commission in the construction of highways within the State. The plan has worked successfully and our prisoners are steadily employed. California has kept her prison-made goods from competing with industry and free labor both within and without the State of California. On the other hand a number of our industries have to meet with competition of prison-made goods manufactured in other States and shipped into the State of California for sale. One of the largest shirt and overall factories on the Pacific coast is located in my district and I have direct knowledge of the fact that a number of men and women, many of whom have families to support, are out of employment and walking the streets of San Francisco. This is the result of convict-made shirts manufactured in Idaho and other States' prisons and shipped into San Francisco and sold at a price below the cost of production by free labor.

It developed at the committee hearings that the State of Indiana had adopted what might be termed "disuse" of their own prison-made goods, whereby they discourage the sale of the products of their penal institutions within their own State. The Indiana State Prison is located at Michigan City, which is almost at the back door of the great city of Chicago. The principal employment of the convicts in this prison is manufacturing furniture, which is shipped into Chicago and other communities in competition with free labor. In the Indiana State Reformatory, located in another section of that State, the prisoners are engaged in the manufacture of baskets in direct competition with the blind and blind craft, for, as you know, baskets, brooms, and such articles are made by the blind. It is my opinion, as I stated in committee, that if the good people of Indiana knew of this extraordinary and unjust method of disposing of their prison-made goods they would be in favor of this law. Unfortunately, however, the people generally know but very little about their penal institutions and how their convicts are employed and what disposition is made of the products of their prisons. That is left entirely to State officials and prison directors, who follow the road of least resistance and as a result are opposed to this meritorious measure.

Penal institutions where violators of law are confined are built and maintained as a protection to society, but society's obligation should not end there. When a man is incarcerated in a penal institution for violation of the law, he should not be employed in the manufacture of goods, wares, or merchandise that come in direct competition with legitimate industry and free labor. [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELCH of California. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. Does not the gentleman think it is essential that prisoners be kept at some employment?

Mr. WELCH of California. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. Now, take a small State like the State of Vermont. How can we diversify our prison industries in order to employ the few prisoners we have?

Mr. WELCH of California. All prisoners should be kept at work, and so should all men on the outside of prisons, but men in prisons should not be given employment within prison walls the result of which forces the idleness of free men on the outside, many of whom are the heads of families.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY].

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, most of the gentlemen who have discussed this bill have gone somewhat into the question of its constitutionality. I shall not undertake to discuss that phase of the bill because I am not a lawyer. As I have stated to the House before, I have always just tried to be an honest citizen.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KOPP] said there were two main questions to be decided here. One was the constitutionality of the bill and the other was the soundness of the policy. I want to discuss the soundness of the policy for just a few minutes, and I wish I might have attention because I want to suggest two amendments which I hope to offer and which I believe will improve the policy somewhat as it is set forth or will, in a measure, guarantee the soundness of the policy.

I am forever against the leasing and contract system in the prisons. I have seen something of that system. I have seen something of the infamy of it, where it was infamously infamous. I have not the language to describe it. But we must have labor for the men in our prisons. We must have it for economic reasons; we must have it for humanitarian reasons, and we must have it for moral reasons. It would be ruinous to the discipline of the prisons, ruinous to the morals of the prisons, and ruinous economically to keep prisoners unemployed. The question is, how we can keep them employed without bringing the things they produce into competition with the products of free labor. As has been brought out, that is utterly impossible. It can not be done. Then the question is, how we may most nearly do justice to free labor and still safely conduct the affairs of our prisons.

I have two amendments to offer to the bill. I have only five minutes and I want to suggest them to the committee. At the proper time I want to offer them. One amendment I plan to offer is in the sixth line, after the word "institutions," to insert the words "institutions which allow prisoners and convicts to work under the contract or leasing system."

I will discuss that further when I offer the amendment, but that strikes out the evil that most of the gentlemen have dealt with this afternoon and tends, in a measure, to destroy the contract and leasing system.

Then again at the close of the first paragraph, after the word "otherwise," "Provided, That this restriction shall not apply to raw materials brought into said State or Territory for purposes of processing or manufacture."

Free labor wants labor in the factories. It is to their advantage for the factories to be abundantly provided with raw materials. The question has come up about our cotton produced by the convicts in Mississippi. We can brag about as big as any of these gentlemen about our convict system. Our convicts are never let by contract, nothing is produced by contract or lease, but the State works them on cotton plantations owned by the State and they are worked in the open air, and this has proved a splendid system; but, now, shall the cotton they produce be under restrictions when it gets to New England or North or South Carolina, which would sadly interfere with the marketing of it? It is a raw material that these people need in the factories and therefore might be admitted without hurting labor. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am going to support this bill. The Federal Government is one of delegated powers possessing only the power voluntarily surrendered to it by the States, and, as I understand this bill, it simply divests convict-manufactured goods of their interstate-commerce character and permits the respective States to pass such laws as the States see fit relative to their being sold within the State. It is undoubtedly a State rights measure.

Now, there may be some doubt as to the constitutionality of the measure. I have not studied the question, but I have determined, if there is any doubt, to resolve the doubt in favor of the constitutionality of the proposed act and to vote for it and let the Supreme Court of the United States determine this question.

I desire to say that I am opposed to convict-made goods being placed in competition with free labor. My own State years ago leased convicts, and I am happy to say that that barbarous system was changed about 25 years ago, and to-day, in Georgia, all convicts, life-termers and those imprisoned for a shorter period, if able-bodied, are worked on the public roads, which does not come in competition with private labor. [Applause.]

The State has a prison farm, to which feeble men and women are sentenced, and they are used in agricultural pursuits, principally raising things that go to feed the convicts and the unfortunate inmates of the State asylum. Some cotton is also raised, but very little, about 1,000 bales. The great bulk of our convicts, white and black, male and female, are used in connection with the work on the public roads.

Some of my southern friends fear if this bill becomes a law that some States may pass a law prohibiting the sale of cotton raised by convicts. I am practical, and I do not believe any State in the Union would pass any law prohibiting the importation of raw material raised on a farm owned by a State. I think the fear of the gentlemen is unfounded.

I sympathize with the families of the convicts, but I have still greater sympathy for the families of law-abiding people who have not violated the law or been confined in the penitentiary, and therefore I am going to vote for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize the point which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has so pertinently stated. The gentleman declares the object of this bill is to suspend interstate and foreign commerce so far as it relates to the subject under discussion. I, too, think this is the object of the bill, that is to say, Congress must take its hands off and confer interstate-commerce powers upon the several States. Congress hereby undertakes to withdraw or suspend the commerce powers of the Constitution, and confer such Federal powers upon the several States for their exercise.

My reply is, that Congress did not give this power and it can not take it away. [Applause.] This power is given by the Constitution, and the interstate-commerce clause which contains this power can not be taken away by the Congress, directly or indirectly, but only by an amendment of the Constitution itself.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONNERY. How does the gentleman make that statement agree with what the Supreme Court said in passing on the Wilson law?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Wilson law did not impair the power given in the interstate-commerce caluse. The case under the Wilson law was a liquor case, and based upon a statute regulating the liquor traffic under what is known as the police power, and the Supreme Court conceded that the State had the right to exercise this police power and that therefore the Federal law must give place to the State's law, a law affecting the health, the morals, and order of the people of the State—a distinct police power and, therefore, paramount to the interstate-commerce power conferred upon the Congress by the Constitution.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the gentleman whether by the same process of reasoning which has been advanced here the Congress could not release unto the States themselves the constitutional right to declare war?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Certainly; it is the same proposition.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have great respect for the talent of the gentleman from New Hampshire. Therefore I give weight to anything the gentleman may state, but I have not considered that angle of the subject. I would say, however, that if we strictly follow the logic of the question, perhaps we could not escape the conclusion which the gentleman has suggested.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Both powers are plenary powers given by the Constitution, are they not?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The commerce clause has this difference: There are some powers under the commerce clause that are suspended, or at least rest in abeyance, until Congress puts them into operation; but they are not taken out of the Constitution, they can not be exercised by the States, and they can be invoked whenever needed, just as much as any other power of the Constitution can be invoked in proper cases.

I would like to vote for this measure. Virginia is not deeply affected as she has no contract convict labor. The bulk of the convicts are on the public roads. I do not desire to enter into that field—these are economical and social questions that none of us have yet solved except, I think all must have—I know we have—enough of humanitarian sentiment to lead us to adopt some system that may build up rather than destroy the convict with the ultimate hope that when he is freed he will not so burden or menace social order as before his conviction.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I was not present during the debate earlier in the day, but recurring to the legal question, is it not true whatever you may say about the difference between the liquor traffic and regulation of the subject we are now considering, that the case you have just mentioned arose under a Federal statute recognizing the power of the States to deal with the liquor traffic. Now, this bill does nothing more than express the opinion of Congress as to the exercise by the States of authority over——

Mr. MONTAGUE. I appreciate the gentleman's point, and I have only five minutes. In reply to the gentleman who frequently makes pungent suggestions, let me say that the Supreme Court has decided that the State can do certain things in the exercise of its police power when conflicting with interstate commerce that can not be done by the States where no police powers are involved. For instance, the goods and wares made by child labor can not be regulated by the agencies of interstate commerce. A law imposing taxation upon the products of child labor for the purpose of regulating that labor under the guise of interstate commerce power is unconstitutional.

It is the same here—just as if the articles were made by child labor. There is nothing in the article manufactured against public morals or the public health. [Applause.]

The commerce clause in the Constitution contains the genesis of our present Federal system. Trade between the States, free and untrammeled trade, brought the Union into being. The States gave up their regulatory powers and control over and between the States and conferred these powers upon the National Government. The pending bill undertakes to suspend these powers and to return them to the several States so far as they affect the products made by convict labor and entering into trade between the States. The powers of interstate commerce affecting these particular products are abandoned and returned to the States where this power resided before the Union was formed. I can not support so reactionary a measure. Nor can the Congress return this power, for Congress can not destroy or impair a constitutional power. This return must be effectuated by a constitutional amendment and not by a legislative enactment. Congress can give no power to a State, and Congress can take no power from a State. These powers inherently reside in the several States or in the Constitution.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, this is one of the most important bills which have come up at this session, and I regret that more time has not been devoted to its consideration.

There are 13 States in the Union which either prohibit the sale of prison-made goods or otherwise place restrictions upon them to prevent or minimize the traffic in them. Such State laws, of course, do not apply to prison-made goods or products in interstate traffic. Therefore the object of this bill is to invoke Federal approval of these State embargoes and thus divest such goods of the protection afforded by their character as goods in interstate commerce. It provides for an exception to a wise and salutary law, and such exceptions are always dangerous.

The committee amendment postponing its taking effect for two years is good, because it gives us an opportunity to study plans for making effective prison labor without disturbing the economic balance. I mean by this, that there would be no occasion for this legislation if convict-made goods were produced under circumstances which did not make them unfair rivals of free labor. The trouble is that we have not been treating the criminal fairly.

There are 110,000 prisoners in the prisons of the United States to-day. That means, my colleagues, that 110,000 families are morally stigmatized; not only that but their income is suddenly stopped and innocent women and children are confronted with the wolf of famine and tortured with the pangs of penury for long periods.

Let me put this question to your deliberate judgment and sense of justice: Has the State the right to deprive the criminal or his family of his earnings? It will, of course, be conceded that the State has the right to imprison and curtail the liberty of a criminal for the protection of society, but has it the lawful ethical right to confiscate his earnings?

It is fundamental that every man has the inalienable inviolate right to labor and the lawful title to that which he produces. Forfeiture and attainder were abolished under our Constitution, and we should not perpetuate it with respect to a convicted prisoner under the fiction that we are doing something for the preservation of social order. It fulfills no worthy purpose to confiscate the earnings of a convict any more than it can serve a desirable end to confiscate his lands or other property.

Such a policy is not only unjust to the criminal and to his family but it is unfair to the taxpayers.

On the other hand, to keep the criminal in idleness is equally unjust. A drone is an offense to civilized society. He has no place in our modern economic system and, least of all, should the Government do anything to make men drones by virtue of its own neglect or by improper laws.

I have made a study of the prison situation for several years, and I am presenting a novel proposition to you at this moment. I claim that all prisoners should be put to work, that they should be paid the prevailing rate of wages, and out of their wages should be kept so much for their keep, and so much should be given to their families for their support, and a certain amount laid aside to be given to them when they leave the institution. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I shall be glad to cast my vote for this bill, notwithstanding the fact that the chairman of the Wisconsin State board of control, Mr. John J. Hannan, used the taxpayers' money to come to Washington on several occasions to oppose the pending legislation.

This bill divests prison-made goods of their interstate commerce feature in such manner that said goods will be liable to the regulatory laws of the respective States. It is useless for the legislatures of the various States to enact legislation to protect the product of their industries and labor from unfair competition with convict-produced goods unless we enact the pending bill and give the States authority to regulate convict-produced goods moving into the States in interstate commerce.

Let me ask those of you who are opposing this bill in the name of the farmer what the farmer's reaction would be if a great dairy State such as Wisconsin were to use her convict labor to produce farm products such as cheese, milk, cream, and butter, and ship those products into your State? Would the farmers of your State welcome such competition which they could not regulate, or would they desire their State to have the authority to regulate which is provided in this bill?

The pending bill gives the States certain State rights, and those Members on the other side of the aisle who are continually talking about how they are opposed to the encroachment of the Federal Government upon the rights of the States should hesitate before they attack a bill which is taking powers away from the Federal Government and giving them to the States.

The American Federation of Labor, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, and the manufacturers throughout the country are united in their support of this worthy legislation. The only opposition seems to be from the prison officials and those business institutions which make huge profits from convict labor.

As to the constitutionality of the legislation, I would rather take the opinion of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who is an exceptionally able constitutional lawyer, than the opinion of some of the attorneys who have attacked the bill in its constitutional aspects.

I sincerely hope that this bill will pass. Certain speakers have brought the question of prison idleness into the discussion. That matter is not before us, because this bill does not make idle prisoners. It merely gives the States the right to regulate. However, since idle prisoners were brought into the discussion, I would say to those who presented that phase that as between free labor, including the men who bared their breasts to the enemy in time of war and who are out of work walking the streets to-day, and convicted bank robbers, murderers, bootleggers, and other criminals who are languishing behind prison walls, I would first protect the free labor. [Applause.]

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it seems to me that there is considerable confusion as to just what is proposed by this bill. This bill does not deal with prison policy. It is not concerned with the working of prisoners at all, or with the policy which should control in the sale and use of prison-made goods. Congress has dealt with the subject in so far as the Federal prisons are concerned, and has provided that the products of Federal prisons shall be consumed by the Federal Government. The sole proposition contained in this bill is to give to each State the right to effectuate its policy with regard to prison-made goods by making prison goods shipped into each State subject to the same police regulation exercised by the State over its own prison productions. What is wrong with that? I agree with my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] who has just spoken. I can not understand how one who, believing in the right and in the necessity of the State to govern in matters of domestic concern, can withhold his vote from a proposition which puts the power of control without discrimination within the States. If the State of Texas or the State of Alabama or the State of Massachusetts wants to admit convict-made goods, there is nothing in this legislation to prohibit it; but if a sovereign State, speaking through its legislature, fixes a domestic policy, I ask what right has citizens of another State, from beyond the borders of that State, to ship into the State, and sell over the protest of the people of the State, commodities which may not be sold under the same conditions if produced by citizens of that State? That is the proposition. All that ever could be asked under the basic philosophy and the general plan of the Union is that no State discriminate in favor of its citizens against citizens of other States.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. Then why have the provision in the Constitution that Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign countries and among the several States, and among the Indians, if that be the case?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In my statements thus far I have been dealing with the question of governmental policy. The gentleman's question is addressed to the matter of power, and that is the next question that I want to discuss, the power of Congress to enact this bill into law. When we formed the Union there were 13 independent nations which had the power to do anything and everything within the province of government not prohibited by their respective constitutions. When those States met through their representatives in the Federal Constitutional Convention they created an agency, the Federal Government, to do certain things for them. All the legislative powers of government, including the broad police power of the States, are vested either in the legislatures of the States, the Congress, or reserved to the people. No power now to be considered or related power is reserved to the people. All governmental power dealing with the transportation and the status of convict-produced articles lies either with the State legislatures or with the Congress. When the States in constitutional convention delegated certain powers to the Federal Government with reference to interstate commerce, a matter with reference to which the States had full power before the delegation and which powers were to be exercised by the Congress, they did not intend, nor did they, to use an expression, "hogtie" themselves or lose some of these powers in the transmission so that the will of the people of the States with regard to this matter can not be effectuated through the Congress and the legislatures of those States. We are dealing with the question of power now. This is not a novel proposition. Congress enacted the Wilson bill. When you examine the Wilson bill and examine this bill you will find that in principle, in policy, and in language they are almost identical. I shall incorporate the Wilson bill in my remarks at this point and also the bill under consideration.

THE WILSON BILL—LAWS RELATING TO INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

COMMERCE IN LIQUORS BETWEEN THE STATES

An act to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries in certain cases

Be it enacted, etc., That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein shall, upon arrival in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

Approved, August 8, 1890.

The bill under consideration:

Be it enacted, etc., That all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined, wholly or in part, by convicts or prisoners, except paroled convicts or prisoners, or in any penal and/or reformatory institutions, transported into any State or Territory of the United States and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods, wares, and merchandise had been manufactured, produced, or mined in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in the original package or otherwise.

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect two years after the date of its approval.

I want now to direct your attention to the decision of the Supreme Court on the Wilson bill. There are just two passages in that decision that I wish to direct your attention to. The Supreme Court in passing upon the Wilson bill said, in regard to Congress enacting the legislation:

In so doing Congress has not attempted to delegate the power to regulate commerce or to exercise any power reserved to the States, or to grant any power not possessed by the States, or to adopt a State law.

And here is another significant statement of the Supreme Court with reference to the Wilson bill, and this is common sense and good law:

The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of the Nation should find itself incapable of disposing of a subject matter specifically committed to its charge.

That is the point I make.

The court said further:

The manner of that disposition brought into determination in this record involves no ground for adjudging the act of Congress inoperative and void.

If that was true as to the Wilson bill, it is true as to this bill.

The question here is not whether convicts should labor or not; it is not a question whether the several States should permit the labor of their own convicts to come into competition with free labor within their respective borders; it is not whether a sovereign State, willing to receive the products of the convicts of other States, may not do so if it wants to. It is solely a question as to whether a State shall be compelled to receive and have sold within its borders articles of commerce which its own citizens could not sell under the same circumstances. It is a question whether an outsider, over the protest of a sovereign State, shall be permitted to enter it with his goods and to defy and hold in contempt the public policy which the people of that State may have fixed for their government. The question is, Shall Members of Congress, professing to believe in the right of a State to govern its domestic affairs and fix its police policies, deny to the State the right to do it? That is the question. That is the only question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Can the Congress deny or the Constitution deny that?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. My time is up. May I have a minute more?

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has 11 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] 9 minutes.

Mr. KOPP. I yield one more minute to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The Constitution gives to the Federal Government the power to regulate interstate commerce, and gives to the Congress of the United States the responsibility of exercising that power. And it is the duty of Congress to do it.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Does the gentleman think Congress can abrogate its duties and powers?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; and Congress, in passing this bill, will be exercising its powers, not abrogating them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON]..

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not concerned about the legal aspects of this legislation, not being a constitutional lawyer, but I am vitally interested in the manner in which it may affect the State of Minnesota where we have a situation that this bill may vitally affect. We found it necessary some years ago to install in our State prison a large farm machinery and twine plant. We produce a considerable surplus of these products which is shipped into neighboring States. This measure might cripple our operations.

I am perfectly willing to vote for this legislation if an amendment is adopted which will make it apply only to products made under the contract system, but not to apply under conditions such as exist in Minnesota and many other States. I want to assure all friends of labor in this House that labor is not adversely affected through our operations.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; I have only two minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. No. I have but two minutes. Do not take this out of my time, Mr. Chairman.

There is no way by which you can prevent prison labor engaged in useful avocation from competing with free labor. That is what you are trying to do in this bill. You are trying to lift yourselves with your own bootstraps. This is not the time to consider legislation of this character, in the closing days of Congress. You are attempting to jam it through the House without giving opportunity for proper consideration. This legislation is of widespread importance and is deserving of more time and consideration than we can give to it here to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, to me it always seems very strange when it is proposed to abolish a wrong or evil of any kind that so many Members immediately inquire whethor or not that particular evil exists in their own community or State. If a thing is wrong, what difference does it make whether or not the evil condition prevails in the State of Ohio, the State of Illinois, or the State of Mississippi? [Applause.] There can never be any real advantage to anyone in the continuance of what is a wrong to the people in general. The advantage even to the few who seem to benefit is only a seeming advantage in the long run. I for one desire to abolish the evil regardless of whom or of what State or community may seem to benefit by its continuance. [Applause.]

We should endeavor at all times to consider, on the basis of principle, such problems as come before us. He is certainly not a good lawmaker who must always be first assured that the enforcement of a principle, however sound and just, does not interfere with the practice or continuance of the evil to be abolished if such evil exist in his own State, where it seems to be an advantage to a few who therefore desire to have it continued.

I would not tolerate the use of convict labor in the production for sale of any kind of goods unless it were provided that the selling price should be based upon a rate of pay, for such convict labor, equal to the standard rate of wages for the like, kind, and amount of free labor necessary to produce the same kind of goods or merchandise in shops and factories not employing convict labor. Only upon such a basis of justice and fairness can the manufacturers and their workmen successfully dispose of their goods in competition with prison-made goods. [Applause.]

But they tell us that we must keep convicts employed in order to prevent them from becoming the victims of mental diseases, even though in so doing we should ruin men's businesses and throw men out of employment. Have those who make this argument stopped to think that in causing free men to be out of employment they may be causing such men to become despondent, even frantic and perhaps mentally unbalanced, and therefore inclined to do things which may place them also in prison? The convict should be treated as a patient who needs to have his mental processes corrected and his mind developed. The notion that we must be sure to make a profit from him or even pay expenses is wrong if it will disarrange industry to a considerable extent.

I sympathize very deeply with the unfortunate being who finds himself behind the gray walls of a prison, but I sympathize also, very sincerely, with the man who tries earnestly to conduct himself rightly and who strives diligently to make proper provision for the family dependent on him. I am not willing, therefore, to have goods made in a prison where practically nothing is charged for the labor employed in the manufacture of such goods; I say that I am opposed to placing such convict-made goods in competition with goods produced by men who must be paid decent wages for their work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have seven minutes remaining. I will use that myself.

I want to say, in justice to myself, that I had no thought of controlling the time on this bill to-day. I have given very little study to the proposition that is before us, because I am not a member of that committee and I have had other matters in hand. But when I came here and found this proposed legislation before the House I was very much impressed with the injustice of the proposition presented; so much so that I got into this matter a little unsuspectingly to myself, and perhaps that accounts for my not making a better showing than I have made in presenting the cause.

Referring again to the report on this bill, I note that it states that three distinct and powerful elements in American life indorse this measure. "First, the American Federation of Labor urges its passage through its properly constitued leaders."

Well, I am not so sure that the American Federation of Labor has its heart set on this kind of legislation, because when we recur to the amount of goods produced by convict labor, which we find in the hearings on the Senate bill at page 145, we find that none of the articles mentioned go beyond 6.47 per cent, as in twine and rope, and that most of the other articles go below one-half of 1 per cent of the manufactured products produced by labor in this country. When we look at that we see that is not of a great deal of importance on this one proposition.

The gentleman from Ohio who has just spoken says that when an evil exists we should not look at home to find out whether it affects conditions around our homes or not.

I deny that any man who labors and produces things, whether he be behind prison walls or outside of prison walls, has committed an evil. I say that statement should be challenged in its beginning, that that is an evil to labor and produce by honest labor.

Mr. CROSSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. CROSSER. The gentleman will admit that any injustice is an evil?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes, but I do not admit——

Mr. CROSSER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BUSBY. I can not yield any further, because I gave a great deal of my other time to the gentleman.

Mr. CROSSER. The gentleman's statement is incorrect.

Mr. BUSBY. I do not admit that an injustice exists in any sense where the competition is right. When there is such a small competition we must admit that it is not on a very strong foundation if a business is affected.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. If the gentleman will read the testimony in the hearings he will be better informed on this subject.

Mr. BUSBY. I have read the hearings, but I will not yield any further. I can not take up all of my time by yielding to you three gentlemen.

The next proposition presented is that the General Federation of Women's Clubs is back of this bill. They are not back of this bill. They are back of prison reform, and I commend them for being back of prison reform. They are against your leasing convicts back in the States where you come from, and you ought to be talking to your legislators instead of asking the Government to make this change. You gentlemen should be seeking a remedy back where you come from.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. No; and, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be pestered to death by the gentleman. The third proposition is the prison-reform organization. This bill would not reach the evils that these organizations are trying to reach. What you need is to go back home, go to your legislatures and get some laws passed that will remedy this situation in your own State. [Applause.]

Now, you say this is to remedy certain conditions, but you must confess that my State is taking care of the convicts through our manner of employing them, and yet you want to obliterate that system by wiping out a possibility of our continuing to produce those products which, if shipped in commerce to another State or the States around us, may be forbidden to be sold there.

What are you folks going to do who are losing all the cotton mills in Massachusetts and the other Eastern States? Are you going to compel each State to found cotton factories and keep within the confines of each State the manufacture of the cotton produced there? Do you not think that North Carolina and South Carolina, in behalf of their factories, might say that you can not ship any of the cotton into those States that is produced by the convicts in Mississippi? In such an event a State might have to say, "We will build factories of our own and manufacture our own materials." So you see it is not a question of State rights. There is no principle of State rights involved in the whole proposition, but when we stop to consider it we find it is a proposition to bring about contention and dissension among the States by wiping out the provision that vests in Congress the control of interstate commerce.

I believe that is all I have to suggest except this: That you gentlemen take stock of yourselves, before you think you are voting for the proposition of State rights, and see what kind of dissension and contention you are liable to fall into with your sister States as well as create among all the States in the country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am requested to ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on the bill may have permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on the bill may have the right to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, Missouri will be vitally affected by this legislation, but, so far as I know, the State officials and prison board are alone in opposing the measure. The people who pay the taxes—labor, business, and civic organizations—want it enacted. I propose to support the bill.

When this bill, which divests goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by convicts or prisoners of their interstate character in certain cases, was pending in the Sixty-ninth Congress, on my own initiative I wrote the penal board of the State of Missouri, calling its attention to the measure, warned the board the bill would eventually pass, and suggested my State should start now to prepare to meet the provisions of the bill.

Shortly thereafter the Governor of Missouri sent members of the board to Washington who appeared before the committee protesting against the passage of the bill.

Under date of February 7, 1928, I received the following telegram from the penal board of Missouri, signed by the secretary:

> Missouri penitentiary, the largest in United States and one of the largest in the world. Am authorized by our penal board to advise you that any Federal statute interfering with the shipment or sale or restriction of shipment of prison-made goods will wreck the finances of this penitentiary and incidentally will saddle upon the taxpayers of Missouri an additional burden of $2,500,000 per biennium. We respectfully request that you use your vote and influence against any such legislation.

In my reply I called attention to my letter, when I suggested the advisability of arranging to employ the men and women in diversified industries, and again told the penal board I proposed to support the bill, now known as the Hawes-Cooper bill, having been introduced in the Senate by Senator HAWES, of Missouri.

I am opposed to the dumping on the market of prison-made goods to compete with similar goods manufactured by free labor.

The telegram I received is certainly misleading, as it states the enactment of the Hawes-Cooper bill "will wreck the finances of this penitentiary." The finances of the penitentiary in Missouri have already been wrecked by mismanagement to such an extent that information received through the press shows a deficit of nearly $1,000,000 and the prediction has been made that the deficit will go higher. I therefore wonder how it will be possible to wreck the finances of the Missouri Penitentiary.

Be that as it may, the fact remains legislation should be enacted that will divest prison-made goods of their interstate character.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Chairman, reluctantly I have been forced by the arguments, as well as by investigation, into believing that the Hawes-Cooper bill should have my support.

The humanitarian plea of occupation for the unfortunates in our prisons, as well as our asylums, has been a necessary part of my education because my sister, Eleanor Clarke Slagle, has been a pioneer in this work, first in Hull House, then for the State of Illinois, then with the Krupp clinic at Johns Hopkins and she is now in charge of the vocational training in our State asylum of the State of New York. I have seen the marvelous products of incompetents at the Binghamton State Asylum. I saw mental incompetents operating a sawmill, of course, under direction, and I have known something of the unfair competition of prison-made goods under false labels, unfairly competing with legitimate industries.

I think it is inherently wrong if the Federal Government has the power to allow the use of the interstate commerce powers in promoting something that is illegal, i. e., the dumping of prison-made goods from one State into another where the sale of prison-made goods is against the law.

The statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS] shows that Minnesota is an outstanding example of everything that can and should be done for our unfortunates, they have no convict labor in Minnesota and they have no unfortunates idling in prison houses because these unfortunates are at work and when anything comes from their prisons it bears the label and there is no trickery or subterfuge about the competition.

I desire also to compliment my friend the distinguished Representative from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] as I compliment the broad-gauged attitude of the American Federation of Labor, of which he is a splendid member, for their unanimous indorsement of the Hawes-Cooper bill.

Take the stitching industry, as an example, and those who are not able to tie up with prison-labor contracts have suffered very severely since the war by the competition of prison-labor contractors, and their testimony is that the prices at which prison-made goods are sold are such as to make it totally impossible for the private manufacturer to get even the cost of his labor and material out of it, to say nothing about a profit, and it is gradually eliminating private manufacturing from this field. Looking at it from another angle, this stitching work in prisons is largely done by male prisoners, and they can not obtain employment in these industries after their release, as the work is there done almost entirely by women, so there is no benefit in training these prisoners. Who does it benefit, then? As far as I can see, the only party benefited is the contractor, and I can not see that it is the function of the Federal Government to protect him.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, and will vote for it.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, in three minutes, the time allotted me, I will not be able to go into the details of the bill now before us, but let me say this is not a new question just making its appearance before Congress. When I first became a Member of the House in 1913 the first committee assignment I received was to be a member of the Committee on Labor of the House and one of the very first bills this committee gave consideration to was a bill carrying in its provisions identically the same principle that is involved in the bill now before us.

About 22 years ago, while a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, I helped to write the first prison labor bill in that State. At that time it was not very popular to advocate that prisoners be permitted to do any work; but we laid down the principle that prisoners should be kept occupied in some way, but that the products of their labor should not come in competition with free labor or free industry. This is the very same principle that is involved in the bill now before us.

There is no question before us of closing up manufacturing establishments in connection with the prisons of the several States. There is no question involved here as to the closing of prison farms in Alabama or any other place. All this bill does is to protect the prison farms of the South and elsewhere so that they can not be overrun by prison-made products from other States, leaving with the States the right to regulate all prison-made products made or imported into the States. That is the principle involved in this bill.

A great deal has been said about the American Federation of Labor, and labor generally, being against all manufactured products by prison labor. This is not correct. The American Federation of Labor has never, to my knowledge, taken such a position. I have just come from the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor convention, which was in session all last week in the city of Philadelphia, where I had the honor of being elected the president of that great organization for the next two years. [Applause.]

The convention, with a voting strength of about 1,150 votes, unanimously indorsed this bill and urges its passage. I carry this message to you from the convention and ask you not to look upon this question as a selfish or a sectional question. It is not the amount of goods produced that concern us so much as it is the principle involved, which we are all opposed to.

The American Federation of Labor or the organized labor movement in general can not be selfish in respect to the passage of legislation, because legislation must be general and must be for union and nonunion alike. Pennsylvania and other States that have legislated on this question are entitled to some consideration in the disposition of this question.

While we all no doubt sympathize with the unfortunates who are behind prison bars, the men and women who do not violate our laws and who are compelled because of necessity to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow are certainly entitled to at least the same consideration as those who have violated our laws and are confined in our penal institutions. While I am ready and willing to help those in our penal institutions, I am not willing to give those who profit of their involuntary servitude any advantage over free labor and industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, I rise to submit a parliamentary inquiry. How can I get recognition for one minute? I wish to support the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All time for general debate has expired.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BEEDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7729) to divest goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by convicts or prisoners of their interstate character in certain cases, had come to no resolution thereon.

PENSIONS

Mr. ELLIOTT, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, presented a conference report on the bill (H. R. 10159) granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows, former widows, and certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes, which was referred to the calendar and ordered to be printed.

THE SECOND PASSING OF THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. FREE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of an American merchant marine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Speaker, an eminent shipping expert recently declared that if the present trend continues the American flag will disappear from the seas in 16 years. This will be but an instance of history repeating itself and will be the second passing of the American merchant marine. Before the Civil War the American merchant marine was a power on the seas and our wooden ships carried a large proportion of our export trade. The war brought changes and greater competition but still the American clipper ships successfully met the competition of foreign flags.

The advent of iron and steel ships brought about adverse conditions to the American ships, and with the power of steam entering into the marine conditions Great Britain subsidized British yards, made large payments for carrying her mails to aid the British shipbuilders and operators, while the United States Government made but one feeble effort to hold her supremacy by heavily subsidizing the Collins Line, two American steamships that were contracted for, and an agreement was made that these American-built ships should be faster and better than anything that could be built by Britain. This experiment demonstrated that the American shipyards could turn out an American steamship the equal, if not the superior, of any, and from 1850 until the United States ceased to meet the growing government aid furnished by Great Britain, the ships of the Collins Line showed their superior sailing qualities. But with the growing competition of Great Britain and the failure of our Government to pay the necessary subventions, our ships in the foreign trade practically went off the seas.

The following figures show the amount of our foreign trade carried in American ships at different periods:

	Per cent
1830	89.9
1840	82.9
1850	72.5
1860	66.5
1870	35.6
1880	17.4
1890	12.9
1900	9.3
1910	8.7
1920	42.7
1924	36.3
1925	34.1
1926	32.2

These figures show a decline in the 80 years, from 1830 to 1910, of 81.2 per cent, and in the 6 years, from 1920 to 1926, of 10.5 per cent.

In 1901 the United States had practically ceased to be a power in the foreign trade and we carried but 9 per cent of our own export trade in American ships, and in 1913, just before the World War, we were carrying practically none of our foreign trade under the American flag. The war changed these conditions, and while in 1913 we had but 1,676,152 gross tons foreign tonnage, we began to build new tonnage, and in 1915 we constructed 155,000 gross tons of new ships; in 1917, 513,000 gross tons; in 1918, 1,000,000 gross tons; and, in 1920, that had increased to 3,660,000 gross tons. By 1921 we had built 10,466,000 gross tons of new shipping and were second only to England in world construction and the second in merchant-marine sea power.

The end of the war, of course, caused a slump in shipbuilding and we found ourselves with many ships and with no business for them. In 1923 the United States Shipping Board owned 1,313 steel ocean-going ships of 1,000 tons or over and the private owners 1,202 ships of 500 tons or over, the Shipping Board owning 6,370,777 gross tons, the private owners 5,243,630, or a total of 2,515 ships with an aggregate tonnage of 11,614,416 gross tons. The world tonnage in 1925–26 was 9,854 ships, with aggregate tonnage of 30,500,000 gross tons. At the end of the war we were carrying about 42 per cent of our own foreign-going commerce in American ships, as the Allies engaged in carrying troops and war munitions and the American foreign-trade tonnage was carried largely by American ships.

At the end of 1926 foreign competition had become so keen that we were carrying only 32 per cent of our own foreign-borne tonnage in American ships. The amount of foreign-borne tonnage carried by American ships is steadily decreasing and according to the reports of the National Conference Board of New York, from 1920 to 1926 our tonnage in building operations has decreased 7¼ per cent while world tonnage has increased during that period 16 per cent, and of this increase Great Britain, our nearest competitor, has increased her new tonnage by 7.7 per cent.

Many shipyards, including the great Cramps yard, in Philadelphia, have gone out of the shipbuilding industry since the World War and new organizations of ship operators have become noticeably less. This indicates to some degree at least that American capital is not being invested in American ships, at least in the foreign trade. Of course, the coastwise and intercoastal trade, a protected industry, with its 7,500,000 tons of shipping, including the Great Lakes industry, is in a fairly prosperous condition, and the large number of ships and the many companies engaged in purely domestic marine commerce, make rates fair to American shippers because of their highly competitive business basis. But when we consider the foreign trade, we have an entirely different picture.

Since 1885 foreign ships have carried over $50,000,000,000 of our foreign commerce, and at a moderate estimate we have paid them approximately $7,500,000,000 freight charges in that period.

Our international trade amounts to almost $10,000,000,000 annually, with freight revenues for transporting this commerce of $600,000,000. Seventy per cent of our international trade is carried in foreign-flag ships.

To meet the demands of this trade during the past five years the United States built 18 ships of over 2,000 tons burden, aggregating 195,191 tons, while Great Britain built 882, with an aggregate tonnage of 4,905,853 tons; Japan, 75, aggregating 333,327 tons; France, 104, with an aggregate tonnage of 630,613 tons; Italy, 87 ships, aggregating 711,499 tons; and Germany, 192 ships, aggregating 1,118,635 tons.

The trans-Atlantic passenger trade has been furnished with new and fast ships of large tonnage, and while the United States has but four ships that can steam 18 knots and but one that can steam over 20 knots, Great Britain has thirty-eight 18-knot ships and twelve 20-knot ships; France, nineteen 18-knot ships and eleven 20-knot ships; Italy, nine 18-knot ships and nine 20-knot ships; Japan, two 18-knot ships and two 20-knot ships; and Germany, two 18-knot ships and one 20-knot ship.

With the year ended June 30, 1926, the value of our foreign-bound export products was $4,864,581,000. Our foreign exports for April, 1927, amounted to $415,211,724, an increase over April, 1926, of $27,238,034. Our trade on the west coast from San Francisco shows a great increase in the foreign trade with South American ports and the Orient. In the years between 1909 and 1913 the value of the products and manufactured articles amounted to an annual average of $98,743,415. Up to 1926 there has been a continued average increase in value, as in 1926 it was $397,213,309 from the port of San Francisco alone.

Foreign nations are alive to the value of our foreign trade, and they demonstrate their sea-minded wisdom by building ships of greater speed, greater economy of management, larger cruising areas, more refrigerated space for perishable cargoes, and more luxury in equipment for the passenger traffic. As these ship-minded nations have constructed new fleets to compete with our old and to a degree worn-out vessels, it is needless to inquire why the world trade is not being carried by American-flag ships.

Since 1921 for every ship of 2,000 gross tons and over that has been built in the United States, Great Britain has built 45, Germany 12, France 5, Italy 5, and Japan 4.

Of the total volume of American foreign commerce, export and import, American vessels to-day carry less than 30 per cent.

Why is it that we have not been able to compete with foreign countries in our shipping? There are various reasons for this.

First. Foreign ships are highly subsidized by their governments.

Second. Owing to higher wages paid American workmen, it costs from 40 to 63 per cent more to build a ship in American yards than in foreign yards. Seventy-eight per cent of the cost of a ship is labor.

To construct a 10,000 dead-weight ton oil-burning vessel of a speed of 14 knots in an American yard costs $171 per dead-weight ton. The cost of a similar vessel in a British yard is $80 per dead-weight ton. This means that there is $1,010,000 more capital tied up in the American than in the British vessel.

In the operation of a ship there are certain fixed charges on the capital invested, aggregating 18 per cent, and made up as follows: Interest 6 per cent, depreciation 5 per cent, repairs 2 per cent, insurance 5 per cent. Therefore, the American operator is at a disadvantage of 18 per cent of the $1,010,000 or $181,000 per year over the foreign owner, merely on account of the increased cost of building of the American ship.

Thirdly, ships under American registry carry more men and pay higher wages than foreign ships.

Capt. Robert Dollar recently said in commenting on the disadvantages of the American merchant marine: By the requirements of the seaman's act an American ship of a certain size had to carry 47 men whose wages were $3,270, while a British steamer of practically the same size had a crew of 40 men whose wages were $1,308, and a Japanese steamer carried 36 men and paid $777 in wages.

Fourthly, the subsistence cost on an American ship is higher than on foreign ships. It costs 60 cents per day per man to feed American seamen as against 42 cents per day per man on a British ship. On a ship of the kind above described this difference amounts to $298 per month.

The higher fixed charges, plus the higher wages paid, in addition to the higher cost of subsistence, put the American shipowner at a disadvantage of about $195,000 per year, as compared with a British shipowner operating a ship of identical size, type, and speed.

On a Dieselized ship the difference amounts to about $250,000 per year.

Another disadvantage of the American merchant marine is the measurement of our vessels under United States law.

Whenever an American ship goes into a foreign port she has to pay pilotage, harbor dues, and so forth, assessed on her tonnage, and this amounts to 20 to 30 per cent more than for her foreign competitors.

Our Government during the war built some 100 ships according to certain specifications. The British measurement of these ships was 3,420 tons, the American measurement 4,283 tons, a difference of 863 tons or approximately 25 per cent.

To further illustrate this disadvantage, the Dollar-round-the-world ships entering Shanghai have to pay $1,932 in dues. A similar foreign ship would pay about $500 less. General Goethals is authority for the statement that the ordinary American ship passing through the Panama Canal has to pay $500 more than the ships of other nations.

Not only by our laws have we put our privately owned merchant marine at a great disadvantage, but the United States Government is maintaining to-day various services at the expense of the taxpayers which unfairly compete with privately owned ships. Examples of these are the Panama transport service and the Army transport service.

The Panama Railroad Co. operates the Panama transport service, and it operates 11 vessels, 7 of which are operated in the New York-Cristobal-Haiti trade and are in direct competition with privately owned ships, and in addition to this Government-owned tonnage, the transport service has chartered other vessels. The latest figures show that out of a total of 221,999 tons of freight and 9,990 passengers carried in 1925, 70 per cent of the passengers were carried in chartered ships and 65 per cent of the cargo was carried in chartered ships. In other words, the 60,000 tons of ships, valued at $6,000,000, operated by the Panama Transport Co., carried 80,000 tons of freight and 2,600 passengers. This line now has pending a request to build several new vessels for its service.

The United States Army transport service has 10 ships, comprising 66,012 dead-weight tons. Seven of these ships are combination freight and passenger ships, one cable ship, and two freight vessels, and are engaged in carrying freight and passengers from San Francisco and New York to Panama, Honolulu, and Manila. These ships are largely in competition with privately owned tonnage, and carry passengers and freight at less than the current freight and passenger rates, while there is ample available tonnage under private ownership to meet the necessities of the Army transport service. While it may be observed that the United States Army transport service was used primarily for the purpose of carrying troops and munitions, and during a national emergency is needed, yet during our war the service had to be augmented by privately owned ships. In fact, the service never did meet, to any large degree at least, the duty imposed upon it. These emergencies are now over and the carrying of troops and munitions in times of peace should be the function of the privately owned tonnage, and if this tonnage is not encouraged there will be no adequate private tonnage available in case of a national emergency, as the history of the past has amply demonstrated.

Our citizens lack loyalty to our American merchant marine. They hire foreign vessels to carry their freight and travel on foreign lines. Nationals of other countries are loyal to ships flying their flag.

An American merchant marine is an absolute necessity in time of war. When the World War broke out we had no ships to transport soldiers or supplies. General Pershing sent out an appeal: "Build ships, ships, and more ships," and to answer that appeal the United States had to spend $3,000,000,000 in a hurried shipbuilding program, while Great Britain did not have to build a merchant ship.

After the World War started our commerce suffered considerably. Foreign ships were withdrawn from regular services and used for war purposes, and we had no ships of our own to render the service.

During the recent coal strike in England our commerce was again threatened. English ships were withdrawn from regular commercial service to carry coal.

We can not commandeer foreign ships in time of war. We can take only those flying our flag. Think of our humiliating position when President Roosevelt ordered our Battle Fleet to go around the world and we had to hire foreign ships to furnish the fleet with coal, as we did not have ships flying the American flag for the purpose. Fine spectacle! Fine battleships, but no way to keep them supplied with fuel. Can we afford to get into that condition again and be the laughingstock of the world?

All will agree that we can not long continue to be a truly great country without an American merchant marine.

The merchant marine act of 1928 gives certain aids to American shipping.

It provides for loans by the Government in an amount equal to three-fourths the value of the ship for a period of 20 years at a rate of interest at which the Government itself can borrow the money.

It also permits the Postmaster General to enter into 10-year contracts for the carrying of our mails. This will insure a definite income to such lines as secure these contracts.

The bill does but little for ships that can not get mail contracts, particularly cargo ships. True, they can borrow money to help build the ships, but there is no aid to take up the difference in cost of fixed charges, wage, and subsistence costs.

We have greatly increased our production in this country and must seek world markets for our surplus of both agricultural and manufactured products. Foreign ships give preference in carrying products of their own countries. We must have our own ships to protect us in our foreign trade.

While the act does something for American shipping, I feel we should go further. We should do something particularly for our cargo ships.

COMPENSATION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH OF EMPLOYEES IN INTERSTATE OR FOREIGN AIR COMMERCE

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question of the employer's liability in interstate air commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks on H. R. 13782, a bill to provide compensation for disability or death resulting from injury to employees in interstate or foreign air commerce, I desire to file herewith a statement showing the necessity for such legislation. The matter was first called to my attention by Ethelbert Stewart, Chief of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor. I need not point out that interstate air commerce has taken such rapid strides, that it is now long past the experimental stage and firmly and permanently established in this country. The air mail celebrated its tenth anniversary but a few days ago. What 10 years ago was a mere experiment over a short distance to-day is a daily unfailing transcontinental service.

The only way that persons employed in interstate air commerce can be protected is by making applicable the longshoremen's and harbor workers' compensation law which was enacted only last year. I am sure that after the experience in State employers' liability laws and the decisions excepting persons employed in interstate commerce from the State laws it will not be necessary to wait many years before giving proper protection to these people.

Mr. Daniel F. Callahan, in charge of the law division of the Labor Department, has prepared a splendid memorandum on the subject as well as a brief review of the cases in point on the subject of injuries sustained by employees whose work is in connection with interstate commerce:

MEMORANDUM OF WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION COVERAGE OF AVIATION EMPLOYEES

By Daniel F. Callahan

The Federal Government has power over interstate commerce. In the absence of Federal legislation the laws of the States control in the regulation of the liability of employers for injuries to their employees engaged in interstate air commerce. The Federal Government has not acted. The Federal Government has enacted the Federal employers' liability act, but this act is limited to interstate railroads and their employees.

Within the past few years there has developed in the United States, and there is now fast developing, an important class of persons engaged in interstate air commerce. These persons are not at the present time covered by any Federal laws with regard to the employers' liability for injury to their employees. Because of the nature of air commerce, confusion exists in the minds of State officials administering workmen's compensation as to the State's jurisdiction. The result is that in many cases injuries and deaths of persons employed in aviation occupations are followed by no relief whatsoever to such injured persons or decedent's dependents.

The cause of the confusion in the minds of State officials is apparent from a recital of the facts inherent in this modern industry. Let us suppose a corporation is organized in the State of Delaware for the purpose of engaging in aviation in interstate air commerce. Principal offices are opened in the State of New York. Employers obtain an air-mail contract from Washington and send an offer of employment to an aviator who at the time is residing in Chicago. The aviator accepts employment by telegram, sending such acceptance from St. Louis where he happens to be the day after he received the offer. He is notified at Louisville, Ky., the following day to report for duty at Minneapolis to relieve a pilot who has started taking a plane from a point in Ontario, Canada, to Houston, Tex., to put it in the air mail service and he is instructed to fly such plane from Minneapolis to Kansas City, Kans., and there turn it over to a third pilot who will continue the trip to Houston.

While flying over the State of Iowa the engine drops out of the plane, the plane falls and the aviator is instantly killed. The deceased pilot's widow is left penniless and seeks to obtain compensation or damages and wishes to know what State law applies and in what State she will start proceedings to obtain an award for compensation or damages. In determining what State law applies we may simplify the problem by merely asking where the contract was made, or where he was working when death occurred. If we agree that the contract was made at the place where he sent the telegram accepting the employment, the Missouri law might apply, although the pilot was only in the State for one hour, had no intention of remaining, and had no intention of doing any work for his employer in that State, and although employer had no assets in the State of Missouri and never intended that any plane belonging to him should ever fly over or land in the State of Missouri. If the law of the place where the accident occurred applies we have the application of law of a State in which neither the employer nor the employee intended to touch land, have any assets or do any business, but merely intended to pass over. Many State laws have provisions excluding certain employees engaged in interstate commerce whether covered by the Federal law or not, while other compensation laws have extraterritoriality provisions which may or may not include persons employed in the State or outside the State, depending on where the contract of employment was made, or inside or outside the State, depending on where the injury occurred. In each case the persons administering local workmen's compensation laws hesitate in the application of the workmen's compensation law. The employer is outside their jurisdiction. There are no assets of employer within their jurisdiction. The pilot was the only person employed by such employer within their jurisdiction. The pilot might be considered a casual employee in that he might have been employed only for one trip. The pilot might have been the only employee of the employer.

The employment or work done may have originated inside or outside their jurisdiction, or was to be completed inside or outside their jurisdiction, or the State was merely a strip of territory over which the pilot intended to fly and never touch. In any one of these cases the authorities may refuse to apply the local workmen's compensation laws. To add to the confusion many States do not have workmen's compensation boards, but provide for court procedure. This results in long delay, due to appeals on questions of jurisdiction, with the odds all in favor of the employer if he is playing for time, as at the present time many employers are not responsible parties, in many cases corporations only owning one or two planes. It is very possible that an accident may ruin financially the owner. In that case the problem is further complicated by bankruptcy or receivership. Workmen's compensation laws allow a minimum amount to injured persons or their dependents, doing away with the old system of allowing a large percentage of damages to an attorney in the event he is successful in his suit for damages. The purpose of the compensation laws is defeated if the questions of law developed are complicated, if witnesses must be obtained from distant points, and the cost involved amounts to more than the award eventually made, if made. If by chance it is decided that no compensation law applies, because no law exists where the contract was made, or the law does not cover the pilot because the compensation is elective rather than compulsory, or does not cover employees where only one employee is employed, where the employee is a casual employee, where the employer is outside the State, or where the injury occurs outside the State, or where the work to be done is outside the State, or where the employment is interstate commerce, or where the contract of employment is made outside the State, or for some other reason, the pilot or his dependents must resort to a common-law suit for damages. In this event the common-law defenses of assumption of risk, contributory negligence, and the fellow-servant rule would, in many cases, mean that the suit for damages would not be successful. The injured pilot and his dependents would be left a burden on society in many cases.

If the longshoremen's act was extended to cover persons employed in interstate air commerce we would have a compulsory law with adequate protection against the financial instability of the employer. We would have a Federal uniform system of administration already in existence and operating efficiently. We would eliminate most questions of the jurisdiction whether of substantive law or procedure as in most cases one law and one procedure only could be followed. We would have stunt flying reduced, commercial flying put on a more business-like basis, safety requirements more possible of enforcement, and thoughtful consideration and protection given to those persons and their dependents who are developing our aviation. The Federal law would cover pilots and all-around mechanics or others directly employed in connection with the interstate movement of the planes.

MEMORANDUM ON PERSONS COVERED BY THE AIR COMMERCE EMPLOYERS' WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL

The bill provides a uniform system of workmen's compensation coverage for employees engaged in interstate or foreign air commerce. It covers any person injured while engaged in interstate air commerce or in work so closely related to it as to be practically a part of it. Besides pilots the bill covers all ground mechanics and persons working in or about an airport, whose services in intrastate and interstate air commerce are such that the services can not be separated in duty and responsibility.

In deciding whether any particular employee is engaged in interstate air commerce and therefore subject to the terms of the bill, no precise rule which would enable an instant and undisputed application in all cases has been laid down. The situation is the same as that which exists under the Federal employers' liability acts covering interstate railroad employees, but decisions of courts have resulted in rules under which it is fairly easy to determine in the greatest number of cases whether an employee is subject to the Federal act. These rules may be summarized as follows:

If the employee was injured or killed while doing—

1. Interstate work; or

2. Intrastate work so closely connected with interstate air commerce as to be a part of it; or

3. Intrastate and interstate work with no interval of time between the commerces separating the duties; or

4. Intrastate and interstate work which could not be separated in duty and responsibility—

The employer and the employee would be covered by the bill.

This means that practically all pilots and ground mechanics, signalmen, guards, clerks, and miscellaneous interstate air commerce air field employees would be covered by the bill.

Reference here may be made to several decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases arising out of the Federal employers' liability acts, which cases would control in construing the bill to find who is covered by it.

In the case of Pederson v. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railway Co. (229 U. S. 146) it was held that one carrying bolts to be used in repairing an interstate railroad bridge and who was injured by an interstate train was entitled to invoke the employers' liability act. In other words, that one employed upon an instrumentality of interstate commerce was employed in interstate commerce. In that case it was said, "The true test always is: Is the work in question a part of the interstate commerce in which the carrier is engaged?" The court also said that the questions which naturally arise are, "Was that work being done independently of interstate commerce in which the defendant was engaged, or was it so closely connected therewith as to be a part of it?"

In the case of Southern Railway Co. v. Puckett (244 U. S. 571), a car inspector going to the relief of another employee stumbled on some large clinkers in his path while carrying a jack for raising a derailed car. It was decided that he was engaged in interstate commerce, the purpose being to open the way for interstate transportation.

In the case of Erie Railroad Co. v. Collins (253 U. S. 77), an employee was assigned to duty in the signal tower and in the pump house of a railroad and his duties were discharged in both interstate and intrastate commerce, and as there was no interval between the commerces that separated the duties, the employee was engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the employers' liability act.

In the case of Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. v. Di Donato, (256 U. S. 327) the employee was employed as a crossing watchman at a particular public crossing and while acting in the course of employment and while flagging a train was killed. In that case it was said that the service of the flagman concerned the safety of both interstate and intrastate commerce and to separate his duties by movements of time or particular incidents of its exercise would be to destroy its unity and commit it to confused controversy, and as the services could not be separated in duty and responsibility the employee was covered by the Federal employers' liability act.

In the case of Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (251 U. S. 259) an electric lineman received an electric shock while wiping insulators which actually supported a wire which carried electric current used by the railroad as power to move its cars engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce. The court decided that the employee was covered by the Federal employers' liability act, because at the time of the injury the employee was engaged in work so closely connected with interstate transportation as to be an essential part of it.

In the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. v. Smith (250 U. S. 101), an employee of an interstate railroad, whose duties were to cook the meals, make the beds, etc., for a gang of bridge carpenters in a camp car which was provided and moved from place to place along the railroad line to facilitate their work in repairing bridges, was injured while occupied in cooking a meal for the carpenters and himself while the carpenters were repairing a bridge in the vicinity. The court said that if he had brought meals to the carpenters employed on the bridge daily it hardly would be questioned that his work in so doing was a part of theirs, and as what he was in fact doing was the same in kind, it did not differ materially in degree, and therefore he was employed, as they were, in interstate commerce within the meaning of the employers' liability act.

In the case of Kinzell v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. (250 U. S. 130), an employee in charge of a car used in removing earth and stones from between the rails of a railroad track was injured while dumping earth to replace a railroad trestle used in interstate commerce, and he was held to be covered by the Federal employers' liability act. The Supreme Court reversed the State court which decided that the employment was not covered by the Federal employers' liability act, because the construction or filling-in work was such that it was new construction, and that such filling-in or construction work did not become a part of the railroad until it was completed and the track placed upon such filled-in land instead of on the trestle. The Supreme Court said that the work had clearly become a part of the interstate railway when the employee was injured, for it had reached the stage where it required the work of men and machinery to keep the interstate tracks clear during further construction, and the work of such men was therefore not only concerned with but was an intimate and integral part of the conduct of interstate transportation over the bridge.

In the case of Walsh v. New York, New Haven, & Hartford Railroad Co. (223 U. S. 1), a car-repair workman injured while replacing a drawbar in a car then in use in interstate commerce was engaged in interstate commerce at the time he was injured and covered by the Federal employers' liability act.

In the case of Norfolk & Western Railway v. Earnest (229 U. S. 114), a fireman injured while walking ahead of and piloting through several switches a locomotive which was to be attached to an interstate train and to assist in moving the same up a grade, was covered by the Federal employers' liability act.

In the case of St. Louis, San Francisco & Texas Railway v. Seale (229 U. S. 156), a clerk was injured while on his way through a railroad yard to meet an inbound interstate freight train and to mark the cars so that the switching crew would know what to do with them when breaking up the train, was held to be covered by the Federal employers' liability act.

In the case of North Carolina Railroad v. Zachary (232 U. S. 248), a fireman was injured after having prepared his engine for a trip in interstate commerce, and being about to start on his run, was walking across adjacent tracks on an errand consistent with his duties.

In Shanks v. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad (239 U. S. 557), where an employee injured while taking down and putting up fixtures in a machine shop, which machine shop was used for repairing locomotives used in both interstate and intrastate transportation, it was held that the connection between the fixture and interstate transportation was remote at best, for the only function of the fixture was to communicate power to machinery used in repairing parts of engines, some of which were used in interstate transportation, and therefore the employee was not engaged in interstate commerce, as the work was too remote from interstate transportation to be practically a part of it.

In the case of Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad v. Yurkonis (238 U. S. 439), where an employee was injured while in and about the performance of his duties, preparing and setting off a charge of dynamite for the purpose of blasting coal, the court held that the mere fact that the coal might be or was intended to be used in the conduct of interstate commerce after the same was mined and transported did not make the injury one received by the employee while he was engaged in interstate commerce.

In the case of Baltimore & Ohio Southern Railroad Co. v. Burtch (263 U. S. 540), where an employee injured while assisting in the unloading at the destination of an interstate shipment, the employment was held to be so closely related to interstate commerce as to be practically a part of it.

CONGRESS AND THE FARMER

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker and colleagues of the House, to my mind the most important problem considered by the session of Congress just ending has been farm relief. Both on this floor and in the corridors of the Capitol the all-important topic of discussion has been relief for agriculture. A great many of you have sincerely wanted to give the farmer relief, but I am afraid a number of you have not wanted to pass any legislation to aid the farmer for fear that this legislation might force the special interests you gentlemen represent to surrender some of the special privileges granted by Congress.

But some of you gentlemen have been afraid to meet the issue squarely and have tried to make the farmer believe he would some day get some relief from Congress. Some of you leaders on the other side of this Chamber have tried to fool the farmer so that he will not bolt your ticket this fall. The farmer has been very lenient with you and your party, but I believe the day has come when he is going to demand an accounting. You gentlemen may have fooled the farmer before, but the game is up; the reckoning day is at hand.

In the debate on the farm relief bill a number of gentlemen gave us startling and convincing figures to prove the farmer is in distress and need. All that appears idle to me; every man who has studied the condition of agriculture must admit that the farmer needs some measure of relief. In fact, most of the gentlemen who opposed the farm relief bill were willing to admit that the farmer is in distress. These gentlemen sympathized with the farmer but threw up their hands in amazement at the idea that any farm bill should be passed. That would be class legislation and special privilege, they said. Sympathy is very fine, but it is not sympathy the farmer wants, nor kind and soothing speeches mailed back home at election time. A speech is a fine thing to start a fire with, but the farmer can not eat it; and it is little consolation for the farmer who watches the sheriff sell his home to read the beautiful remarks made about him by Members of both Houses of Congress.

It is altogether proper that we should be considering the problem of the farmer here, since it was the Congress which passed the laws now grinding down the farmer. As a result of the laws passed here, the farmer pays taxes not only to support the Government but to support the railroads, manufacturers, and bankers. First you passed the Esch-Cummins transportation act, then in 1922 you passed the Fordney-McCumber tariff law.

In the discussion of farm relief here we have heard much about class legislation and price fixing. Let us take this Esch-Cummins law. What is that except price fixing? That law is a command to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates so that the railroads of the country can earn a net income of 5¾ per cent upon their valuation. The valuation of the railroads was placed at approximately $19,000,000,000 as a result of that law. Now, the actual value—the price these roads could have been bought on the stock exchange—was not more than $12,000,000,000. That means the railroads receive a clear profit of more than 9 per cent on their investment.

Under the Esch-Cummins law the Government simply said to the railroads: "Go ahead and operate these roads and we will guarantee you have enough left after paying all expenses to give you 5¾ per cent on what you think you have invested."

What was the result? In 1920, the first year of the operation of this law, the railroads reported an increase in their operating expenses for that year of $1,400,000,000 in excess of the operating expenses of any preceding year. The Interstate Commerce Commission immediately advanced freight rates upon all commodities 25 to 40 per cent in designated groups of railroads. This increase in rates, even though two years later the commission was forced by public sentiment to make a general reduction of 10 per cent, alone costs the American people the additional sum of $1,500,000,000 a year. You know and I know that these increased freight rates are always passed along by the middlemen to the farmers and consumer.

And more than that, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the farmer pays more than his share of the freight. In fact, hearings conducted by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce during the Sixty-seventh Congress brought out the fact that agriculture is paying more than twice its just share of the revenues the railroads receive for freight transportation. Less than 9 per cent of the total volume of freight carried by our railroads comes from the farms, while this 9 per cent pays more than 18 per cent of the total freight revenues of the railroads. This does not take into consideration the enormous freight charges on implements, machinery, and everything shipped from our factories to the farms.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, if I should introduce a bill to guarantee every farmer in the country an income of 5¾ per cent on his investment, after all expenses of farming had been subtracted, you would laugh me out of Congress. You would point to me as the prize joke of the National Capitol and the jeers of the large city newspapers would ring in my ears forever. You would call this a plan to pension the farmers.

But this is exactly what they have done with the railroads.

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that a farmer owned land he valued at $10,000, although the actual value was about $7,000. Now, under this imaginary Esch-Cummins farm bill we would say to the farmer: "List all of your expenses; pay yourself a salary, and don't forget your wife and children are on the pay roll also. Keep account of every penny you spend, even the cost of driving your car to town for groceries. Now, at the end of the year you have produced a certain amount of corn, wheat, or cotton. We are going to fix the price of this so that you can sell it for enough to pay all of your expenses, and besides that you are going to have $575 clear money to put away for old age."

Gentlemen, you would laugh that bill out of court.

Now, let us consider the Fordney-McCumber tariff law. This question of the tariff has long been a political issue. It is considered proper for the Democrats to denounce the protective tariff and necessary for the Republicans to support it. I have my own views on the tariff. They are sound Democratic views, too. But I shall not tell you what I think the tariff does for the farmer. You might call whatever statement I made "Democratic propaganda." I shall be satisfied to quote what some of my Republican friends have said about the tariff.

In speaking in favor of the McMaster resolution recommending a revision of the tariff rates, Senator McMaster, of South Dakota, a Republican and a banker, said in the Senate on January 9, 1928:

> Before entering into a discussion of the pending resolution it would be well to examine and to inspect a certain nostrum that is being used for the purpose of soothing and allaying this rising tide of discontent among the farmers over these tariff relationships. That nostrum is this: We are informed by those in high places with great assurance that everything the farmer uses in farming is upon the free list and most of the things that he sells are upon the protected list. In order that we may have a clear and comprehensive idea of those articles upon which the farmer pays a duty, and which are known as the necessities of life, but which he does not use in farming, permit me to read just a partial list: Kitchen and household utensils, stoves, furniture, sheets, pillowcases, mattresses, rugs, carpets, table linen, tableware, clocks, glassware, earthenware, clothing, hosiery, gloves, all wearing apparel, and hundreds of other articles.
> It is equally certain that the following articles, which the farmer uses in farming, are also upon a highly protected list:
>
> "Scythes, sickles, hammers, saws, scoops, shovels, pitchforks, corn knives, grass hooks, grindstones, pliers, files, drainage tools, machine tools, horseshoes, horseshoe nails, nails, steel wire, galvanized wire, roofing felt, strap leather, paints, brick, tile, baling wire, cast-iron pipe, cream separators valued at $50."
>
> Then we are informed that harnesses are upon the free list. The buckles and the clasps and the hardware used in connection with harnesses are upon a highly protected list, and who ever heard of a farmer using a harness that did not have a buckle or a clasp or some hardware on it? As a matter of fact, the importations of harness into this country are insignificant. All of which goes to show that this provision for free harnesses is a sham and a fraud.
>
> There are those who point with great pride to the fact that farm implements are upon the free list. Let us examine the subtle sophistry of that contention. The prices of farm implements are controlled and dominated by a trust that not only controls and dominates the farm-machine market of America, but which controls and dominates the farm-machine market of the world. The importations of farm machinery into this country are insignificant. Last year we exported $78,000,000 worth of machinery, and the farm implement is one of the few manufactured products of this country that has been steadily rising in price since the war. A binder costs more money to-day than it did at war peak prices, because the heads of the manufacturing concerns which manufacture farm implements meet in secret and behind closed doors, and make up the price list for the ensuing year. Does anybody doubt that statement? Let the record speak. The report of the Federal Trade Commission on the causes of high prices of farm machinery says:
> "Practically all important manufacturers of farm implements are members of the National Implement and Vehicle Association, which was formed in 1911 by the union of several existing farm-implement associations.
> "Under cover of bringing about uniform cost accounting, uniform terms of sale, and standardization of products the manufacturers who are members of these associations repeatedly advanced prices of farm implements by concerted action during the period 1916 to 1918, inclusive."

What they were doing during that period they were doing before that time and continued to do after that time.

On December 15, 1926, Mr. Dickinson, a Republican Congressman from Iowa, said:

> I do not believe those of us from the Central West are going to stand for a high tariff and say there can be no reduction of the tariff on commodities where they make an excessive profit or assist in monopolizing the control of the commodity.

And on March 2, 1927, Congressman Dickinson, a Republican leader, said:

> It will therefore be the problem of the farmer to study the tariff schedules and everywhere he sees that exorbitant prices are being charged or that excessive profits are being made, he will join hands with those who are asking for tariff revision downward on such commodities in order to secure the equality to which he believes he is entitled.

In 1922 you passed the Fordney-McCumber Tariff law, which came recommended as the cure-all for the ills of the farmer. That law was supposed to bring prosperity to agriculture overnight.

Let us see what the result has been. Certainly not all of the distress of agriculture is caused by the high tariff, but I just want to show you gentlemen that your high tariff bill, even if, as you claim, it did no harm, has certainly done no good. Instead of improving the condition of agriculture, it has been growing much worse. The Department of Agriculture tells us that from 1920 to 1925 the value of farm lands in the United States decreased from $63,000,000,000 to $47,000,000,000, a loss of $17,000,000,000 in only five years. Taking into account the loss in value of equipment, buildings, and crops, the decrease in the farm wealth amounts to over $30,000,000,000 in so brief a time.

A recent report of E. H. Wiecking, of the Department of Agriculture, shows that farm values declined 4 per cent during the year 1926–27. Mr. Weicking shows that measured in—constant dollars of the purchasing power * * * farm real-estate values on March 1, 1927, were really worth 20 per cent less than they were 15 years before, on 1912.

On March 1, 1928, a total of 3,941 banks had failed during the Harding-Coolidge administrations, and more than 95 per cent of those banks were in the agricultural sections of the country.

Yet some of you tell us the entire Nation enjoys prosperity. I agree that the special-privilege crowd are exceptionally prosperous. The railroads have enjoyed unprecedented prosperity. The industrial section may be prosperous, and the speculators on the stock exchange are overprosperous, but the farmer is certainly far from being in a prosperous condition.

Let me give you here a table showing the price of farm implements in 1924 as compared with 1914. This table was prepared by Congressman STRONG, a staunch Kansas Republican, and inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Implements	1914	1924
Hand corn sheller	$8.00	$17.50

Study that table, gentlemen, and you will discover one reason why the farmer is not prosperous. That will show you what the Esch-Cummins law and the tariff law is doing for the farmer. The price of farm products has been going down since 1920. We have seen the price of land go back below the prewar level, but the price of this machinery the farmer must have is not being reduced very rapidly.

The tariff may not cause all these high prices, as you gentlemen on the other side say. I believe the tariff is partially responsible. I also contend that freight rates are largely responsible. We know the tariff-protected trusts who manufacture these implements are responsible. To-day these implement trusts are fighting any tariff reduction and are willing to make campaign contributions to any candidate or party pledged to maintain our high tariff. If the tariff does not affect the price of implements, then I ask you why are these implement trusts so anxious to keep a high tariff? "There is a reason," and you gentlemen must know the reason.

Mr. Speaker, the greatest danger I see for our country to-day is the menace of sectionalism. George Washington warned us to avoid this evil and pointed out its dangers. But the farmers of the West are awake to what has been done. A day of reckoning is near. The farmers and small business men of the West will no longer submit to the unjust freight rates established by the Esch-Cummins law. The West knows the truth about our high tariff and is in revolt against robbery by tariff-protected monopolies of the East. Congress must repeal the laws which rob the farmer and offer some farm-relief plan or the old order is passed and soon we shall see the entire West, regardless of former political sympathies, united in one great effort to throw off the yoke placed about the neck of our farmers and consumers by the high tariff and unjust freight rates.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman introduced a bill to cure the situation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then I object.

Mr. SCHAFER subsequently withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

MT. M'KINLEY NATIONAL PARK

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take the bill (H. R. 8126), an act to repeal the sixty-first proviso of section 6 and the last proviso of section 7 of an act to establish the Mt. McKinley National Park in the Territory of Alaska approved February 26, 1917, and agree to the Senate amendment to the title.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was read and agreed to.

HISTORICAL MUSEUM AT DEFIANCE, OHIO

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 82, providing for the erection of a public historical museum on the site of Fort Defiance, Defiance, Ohio, and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 82 and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, what is the nature of the Senate amendment? I am opposed to the whole bill.

Mr. LUCE. The proposal in the bill was that we contribute $50,000, and that the balance of $50,000 be contributed by the State of Ohio. The House changed the appropriation to $25,000 and $25,000 to be appropriated by the county in which Fort Defiance is situated.

Mr. CRAMTON. And the Senate refuses to accept the House amendment?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is the gentleman in position to give the House any assurance as to what the attitude of the House conferees will be?

Mr. LUCE. I am not in a position to tell the gentleman what the other conferees will do, but I believe the House amendment was wise.

Mr. CRAMTON. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and until the gentleman can enlighten us as to whether the other conferees will stand with us I shall be obliged to object.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 372

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the enactment of a resolution introduced by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, on January 10, 1927, I introduced in this body House Resolution 372, which is as follows:

Resolution

Whereas it is the opinion and desire of the Sixty-ninth Congress to in every instance avoid war and its consequences, whenever the same can be honorably done; and

Whereas the facts and conditions existing, as reported by the press, concerning the relations of the United States with the Nicaraguan Government do not seem to the House of Representatives to justify the entry into any war; and

Whereas the sending of warships and military forces to Nicaragua, and the pursuit by said vessels of other ships, as is reported, may endanger the peace and tranquillity of the United States and the citizens thereof; and

Whereas the course that seems now being followed by the United States Government subjects our Government to the liability of being thrown into an embarrassing position: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense and request of the House of Representatives that the Committee on Foreign Affairs promptly ascertain from any department of the Government, and from any reliable source, any and all information bearing essentially on the subject, and that the same be promptly reported to the House of Representatives for its information, to the end that the facts may become fully known and war be averted in any reasonable and proper way.

At the time of the introduction of this resolution 16 months ago, the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of our military forces, was just about to embark upon a program of sending American marines to Nicaragua, for the alleged purpose, as stated in his message of that date, to protect American lives and American property in Nicaragua.

At that time myself, with some other Members of this body, made effort to ascertain what American lives and what American property situated in Nicaragua, had been destroyed or even threatened with destruction, and to ascertain the facts in this regard the above resolution was introduced.

On January 12, 13, 28, and February 1, 1927, the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, which was composed of 13 Republicans and 8 Democrats, was called together to give consideration to the resolution introduced by myself, and also resolutions somewhat similar in character introduced by my colleagues, the Hon. JOHN J. MCSWAIN (Democrat), of South Carolina; Hon. GEORGE HUDDLESTON (Democrat), of Alabama; and Hon. WALTON R. MOORE (Democrat), of Virginia.

At that time, however, by almost a strict party vote of the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee, permission to obtain this information was denied and refused by the majority of the Foreign Affairs Committee. Notwithstanding repeated requests for information as to what civilian American or what American's property had been destroyed in Nicaragua, that furnished the alleged basis for sending American troops there, no one has yet disclosed or answered.

It was then pointed out by myself and others before the Foreign Affairs Committee that it was in our opinion inadvisable to embark upon the program of sending a few thousand troops into Nicaragua prior to any positive threatened destruction of American civilian life or American property. It was believed also that such a course would lead us into difficulty, and so it has, as time since that date has disclosed.

Prior to sending our marines there, no American had been killed or threatened with violence, but since sending our marines there under President Coolidge's order, we have had 21 American marines killed and 45 of them wounded.

The Constitution of the United States vests the sole power of declaring war in the Congress of the United States. The President has no constitutional right or authority to declare war. The Constitution of the United States vests in the President the authority to be Commander in Chief of the troops in the event war is declared, but no power to put our Government in actual war. This is a very wise provision, as the power to commit a nation to and take such nation into war should never be committed to one man, and one man only, however wise and able he might be.

Up to this hour Congress has not declared any war upon Nicaragua. Yet under President Coolidge's direction, through the military officers, we have been in combat with Nicaraguan forces for more than a year. We have bombed them, and Sandino and his forces have retaliated and carried on military combat against our forces in their territory.

In defending the President's policy in Nicaragua, some have said we are bound to protect the lives and investments of European nations in countries of this Western Hemisphere, inasmuch as we deny them to act in a military capacity on the soil of this hemisphere, claiming such is our duty under the Monroe doctrine, and justifying our landing of troops in Nicaragua on that ground. But the facts are that neither England or any other European country made any request of the United States to look after their subjects and property interests in Nicaragua, until long after we had landed our troops there on our own responsibility. Of course, after our troops were sent there, and had engaged in combat with Nicaraguan forces, England did ask us then to safeguard her interests, as it was under the then existing circumstances liable to involve English property and life.

In the name of the Monroe doctrine, let us not invoke any wrong. The Monroe doctrine means simply as President James Monroe stated in his message of December 2, 1823:

We should consider any attempt on the part of European powers to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. We could not view any interposition by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

Monroe's doctrine laid down, was primarily for the protection of our own Government and incidentally the principle is a protection to other governments on this hemisphere.

To this doctrine all good-intentioned citizens of this, our Government, subscribe. It is our policy to keep safely from the shores of this hemisphere the establishment of European monarchy. It is interesting to notice the recent argument of some who indorse the President's policy in Nicaragua, and say that our forces should be down there to protect private American life and property, at the same time asserting that the American citizens who settled in the recently flooded district of the Mississippi Valley went into the Mississippi Valley with their eyes open, and that they should not expect the American Government to pay for their flood protection, and that the Federal Government should not stand sponsor for the full protection from such a flood as devastated that area.

Surely, the United States Government, and any other government for that matter, should use every reasonable and honorable means to avoid war. Friendly relations with all nations should be cultivated, so far as it can be done, honorably. First, because peaceful relations, when honorably maintained, advance the good purposes of civilization. And secondly, good business, trade, and commercial relations are increased when and where we can honorably maintain peaceful relationship with other nationalities. Nations like individuals must know, and if they do not know, must surely learn that the will and wish of the one can not always be imposed upon others without their consent and without their wish, and that while the rights of the one should be respected the rights of the other should also be respected, and that right and justice should prevail, and that might or power ought not go unharnessed, spreading its harm.

I consider it is the first duty of any Government to be right, and, being right, it is entitled not only to protect, but to defend itself in maintaining its right.

Some say that our troops have been sent to Nicaragua in order to see that they conduct an honest and fair election down there.

With all the progress and advancement, with all the discoveries and inventions; with all the wonderful work of science; still there is one thing that remains the same. Human nature is about the same to-day that it was centuries ago, and it will remain much the same in time to come. The most important lesson for a nation as well as for an individual to learn is to attend strictly to one's own business and not be meddling with the affairs or business of others. While Mr. Coolidge has our troops in Nicaragua, trying to have those people conduct an election like he thinks it ought to be, we hold an election in Chicago and the gunman runs riot and a United States Senator's house gets bombed.

It is not unreasonable to wonder if Sandino, in Nicaragua, does not think Mr. Coolidge ought to use our own troops we have sent down there and bring them to Chicago and to Pennsylvania, and by their use see if we can have honest and orderly elections in our own country.

The time for our Nation as well as all other nations to use the highest decree of caution and care is before we get into difficulties. By so doing, a nation, like an individual, may avoid much trouble. That we have erred and blundered in getting ourselves involved in Nicaragua there is no question. Since the President's sending American troops there many of them have been killed and wounded, whereas before their going no civilian Americans nor their property had been killed or destroyed.

Far more than a million dollars of American taxpayers' money has been expended in the enterprise, and such a policy destroys and injures American commerce and trade. And if there ever was a time when we should be trying to keep on friendly relations with other nations and extend our markets and open up avenues for new fields of trade so as to dispose of our surplus that time is now, especially when the profits of the farm, if any at all, are so low and farm conditions so depressing.

The truth about the Nicaraguan situation is that Diaz was defeated for the Presidency in Nicaragua. He was agreeable and satisfactory to certain business interests, among them some investors from New York; but the man who had defeated Diaz was not satisfactory to these same investors. So he was driven out of power and had to leave the country, temporarily, to save his life. While he was out of the country, not by choice but as a necessity to save his life, Diaz had himself chosen by his friends connected with the Government—his main opposition having been driven out. Diaz took possession in effect by force, and backed up by American troops has since been able to maintain possession of the Government offices.

A remarkable thing about our American occupancy of Nicaragua is that while those who defend Mr. Coolidge for sending our troops down there to help put and keep Diaz on the throne, claim that our troops went at the request of Mr. Diaz and his legislative body. These same defenders of the Coolidge policy who have asserted our right and propriety in staying there and controlling their elections, now find that this same Diaz legislative body recently refused to indorse our right to control and supervise their elections. So the Coolidge policy in Nicaragua is finding itself in the position of the neighbor who tried to separate a man and wife from fighting—the poor unfortunate neighbor found himself turned against. As I said heretofore, verily, "human nature" remains the same.

By the Coolidge occupancy of Nicaragua we have—

First. Lost American lives where prior to the occupancy none had been lost.

Second. We have incurred the ill will of smaller nations and are suffering in loss of trade, and what America badly needs to-day are markets for surplus products, whether of field, mine, or factory.

Third. We have expended far more than a million dollars out of the Federal Treasury—the American taxpayers' money.

But, on the other hand, by taking such a course the President has pleased a few American investors, who want to maintain the man of their choice at the head of the Nicaraguan Government, and so such is "human nature."

The truth is that Coolidge's policy in sending troops to Nicaragua is not to protect American lives and American property there from destruction by the people of that country. The answer to those who allege that such is our purpose of going there is that no one has yet been able to name a single American killed or threatened with violence prior to the sending of our troops there. If such is the basis of our going, why can not some one name the Americans who were killed or threatened before we sent our troops there or even at the time they went? What has happened since the landing of our troops is just what would naturally be expected to happen. We have had some of our marines killed and wounded and we have killed many Nicaraguans.

To those who say we are there to uphold the Monroe doctrine the answer is that no foreign power made any suggestion of attempting any kind of military movement in Nicaragua prior to our sending our troops there, and one country—England—only asked us—and that was after we had our forces there—to look after her interests, and that not until we were trying to maintain Diaz in power as President, the very man whom the Nicaraguan people had shown they did not want.

Those who have been hard pressed to give a real reason for having our forces in Nicaragua finally and as a last resort say the property we are there to protect is our Nicaraguan canal rights. The answer to that is that we only have an option to build a canal and that option was to run for 99 years, and more than 80 years may yet pass before we exercise the option to build, and, indeed, we may never do so, as it is only an option which may or may not be exercised. Moreover, even if we had bought and paid for the ground for canal purposes, which we have not done, nothing has been put upon the land over which we have an option, so there is nothing connected with the canal privileges, so far as anything we have there is concerned, except the naked ground, which can not be carried away or destroyed.

After the defender of the President's policy in Nicaragua flounders over one reason and another and fails even to satisfy his own mind, final resort is made to the contention "that both sides invited us there and we are there for that reason." Of course, Diaz and his forces want us there and "the powers that be" with our President, with their American capital, want our military forces there to keep Diaz and his group in power.

The forces opposing Diaz have not once, but time and time again, shown by their conduct they did not want our forces there for any purpose. They have even requested our withdrawal. In order to more forcibly show their unwillingness for our forces to be there they have resisted by force of arms. I suspect we in this country would not welcome armed forces of some other country squatting on our territory, supervising our elections, and by force of arms see to it just how we should hold an election.

The truth is we should not have put our forces in Nicaragua. The policy of the present administration is, and he tells the American farmer "he must work out his own salvation," "he must take care of himself"; and to the American investor and financial wizard the President insists on maintaining not only a high protective tariff for his enrichment at home, but he seems to furnish armed forces to make things safe and suitable and as he exactly wishes in Nicaragua. The taxes of all are to maintain not the many but the few.

THE TYSON-FITZGERALD BILL

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Tyson-Fitzgerald emergency officers' bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, the bill known as the emergency officers' retirement bill has been pending in Congress since the close of the war; it has passed the Senate three times and has been five times favorably reported by the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. The bill provides that emergency officers of the World War who are 30 per cent permanently disabled shall be eligible for retirement under the provisions of the measure.

The bill has for its purpose to do away with discrimination between emergency officers and the officers of the Regular Army. It is shown that during the war the emergency officers suffered casualties much greater than the officers of the Regular Army. Figures show that there were 2,040 emergency Army officers killed in action or died of wounds received in action. This was 93 per cent of the Army officers killed. There were 8,122 of these officers wounded in action. Under the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill, 3,251 emergency officers still disabled more than 30 per cent will receive an average retirement pay of $132 a month, an increase of $59 over the $73 a month they are now receiving. This is less than one-half the $277 a month now received by the average retired Regular Army officer. These figures I get from the national legislative committee of the American Legion.

It appears that the Regular Army officer for some reason has had a much better standing with Congress than the man who met the Government's emergency call and who by merit on the field of battle is worthy of recognition.

While the bill, no doubt, is subject to criticism for not offering compensation to those who have a rating of disability below 30 per cent and is much lower in rate of pay than that allowed to the retired Regular Army officers, yet it does offer recognition and added benefits to some 3,000 disabled officers of the World War who have been neglected by the Government since that war.

These men, in my opinion, have been discriminated against; they entered the war in good physical condition, many were occupying important positions which they now are unable to fill on account of loss of health or because of crippled condition. The rest of us remained at home and felt secure on account of our American Army at the front in command of these men who are now asking to be justly rated by Congress.

It is important, of course, that discrimination be eliminated in dealing with the soldier who faithfully gave his services to his country. It is likewise important that the officers who entered the service on an emergency call of the Government shall receive the same treatment as the Regular Army officers, on the basis of rank and degree of disability.

The State of New Mexico, which I have the honor to represent in this body, has always stood for fair and proper treatment of those citizens who entered the service during the World War, be they emergency officers or privates. I take great satisfaction in supporting any legislation that offers a very much merited reward to those afflicted as a result of that great struggle. The Government can never restore health to the crippled or to those who contracted a permanent disability. We should, therefore, be generous to the limit in their behalf.

I insert herein the beneficiaries from my State, New Mexico, by name, address, occupation, date of birth, extent of disability, monthly compensation now received, and the proposed monthly compensation under the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill:

FARM RELIEF

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed an address delivered by myself over the radio on last Friday, May 11, 1928.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent I submit for printing in the RECORD the following address delivered by myself over the radio in Washington, D. C., on May 11, 1928:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, true farm relief legislation will be secured when the Congress enacts a law enabling the farmers of the Nation to become builders of their own destiny, rather than permit their enemies to continue the masters of the farmers' fate.

The farmer is justly entitled to a new freedom by which and through which he will enjoy for the first time an economic equality with other businesses and enterprises. True farm relief legislation can not be obtained short of an enabling act which will pledge a proper governmental agency to protect the farmers in securing a reasonable price for their products, provided the farmers themselves, by mutual contracts, agree on their part to control their production and to maintain an orderly marketing program. When the farmers become free to control their production and marketing, they can name within reason the sale price of their own products just as other folks do.

There can be no real farm relief without price elevation of farm products, and there can be no permanent price elevation of farm products without efficient control of production. A plan which elevates prices and leaves the plan to be wrecked by the first big crop, at best, is only temporary. A plan which enables the farmer to control his production and thus ushers in better prices, will become permanent and lasting.

The farmers without organized effort on their part can not control their production, neither can they inaugurate and conduct a successful marketing program. Surplus production is the great problem and can only be controlled by voluntary organized efforts on the part of the farmers. It is said farmers will not organize, and hence there can be no efficient surplus control or farm relief. I deny this charge. They will organize if Congress will pass an enabling act making organization worth while. They will voluntarily control their surplus by an orderly marketing program and production curtailment, if assured that their prices will be stabilized at a reasonable profit above the cost of production.

As to the basic agricultural commodities, there is only one great problem—that of surplus control. To my mind it can be effectively solved by a contract authorized by law whereby a Government-owned corporation contracts with the producers of basic commodities to help them stabilize their prices at a fair minimum upon condition that the farmers contract with each other and with the corporation to make such curtailment of production and sale as may be necessary not to depress the market at any time. Once this control of production and marketing is established, a reasonable price for the commodity will be assured. The Government will have kept its part of the covenant without any loss. As the night follows the day, so will the control of prices within reasonable limits follow control of production and marketing.

Many of my radio audience, I am sure, are wondering whether or not this "consummation devoutly to be wished" can in fact be accomplished. Let me say that I have introduced a bill (H. R. 77) embodying my conception of a plan to enable the producers to control their production and marketing programs and thus name within reason for the first time the prices at which they will sell the products of their own toil.

Let me tell you briefly about this bill and how it will establish an efficient surplus control. The bill is patterned after the War Finance Corporation act, the first sections being identical with that act except that the bill proposes to create the farmers' finance corporation rather than the War Finance Corporation. This corporation is to be authorized to make loans through the banks of the Nation, much the same as the War Finance Corporation, directly to the producers of basic agricultural commodities. The loans are to bear 4 per cent interest, be made for the full amount of the average price of the commodity for the last 10 years, with the commodity as the sole and only collateral and without any right on the part of the farmers' finance corporation to collect any amount of the loan not repaid by the sale of the commodity. Thus the farmer will in effect be receiving as a part of the sale price of his commodity an amount equal to the average price for which he usually sells the commodity, thereby establishing the average price of the commodity as the minimum price of the same.

Now, in my mind's eye I can see hands held up all over the Nation for permission to ask what would become of the assets of the corporation loaning 25 cents per pound on cotton if cotton should at the same time be selling for, say, 15 cents per pound or even less? Well, I will admit that the proposition would be absurd if there were no further provisions in the bill for the protection of the Government's corporation. It takes two to make a contract and no one could expect a Government-owned corporation to be required by Congress to render so great a benefit to the farmers without them agreeing to do something on their part to make the corporation secure in the loans made. There should be and must be a mutability of contract, with a good and sufficient consideration flowing and to flow between the farmers, the banks through which they are to get their loans, and the farmers' finance corporation.

Therefore, the bill provides that before any of the loans mentioned are made farmers planting 75 per cent of the acreage of cotton, for instance, grown in the United States shall have signed and abided by contracts with each other, with their banks, and with the corporation, agreeing and obligating themselves that the cotton advisory council be authorized to control within reasonable limits the acreage planted so as to hold production within reasonable bounds and that the farmer will not sell any of the particular basic commodity without express authority from the advisory council. Briefly stated, by my plan Congress would simply propose to the farmers that if they would by mutual contracts control their production and marketing, then the farmers' finance corporation would by loans enable the farmers to name within reason the selling price of the products of their own toil.

The banks would receive a reasonable compensation for handling the transaction, but would not become liable as indorser or surety. The duties of the directors of the corporation are plainly specified in the bill. The advisory council of the commodity to be handled has jurisdiction of discretionary matters and issues most vital to the farmers, and are to be selected by the governors of the commodity-producing States until the farmers are sufficiently organized, and then to be selected by the farmers themselves. This is clearly constitutional, as members of the advisory council under this bill would not be Federal officials, but only officials recognized by contract much as State highway officials are now recognized by the Federal Government in its present highway 50–50 plan or program. This plan would leave the friends of the farmer in full control of his affairs, would enable the farmers to borrow if they wished the fair price of their commodity, to be repaid only when the commodity was sold, and then only out of the proceeds of the sale.

The farmer would be required to hold his product off the market until it could be sold for enough to repay the loan, all charges such as storage, insurance, interest, etc., and such an additional amount to the farmer as would remain from the sale of the commodity at a fair price. The farmer would be able to hold his product, for he could borrow at a very low rate of interest the reasonable value of his product. The farmer would contract to curtail his production, providing his friends decided it best for him to do so, on condition that all farmers make a similar reduction and provided he received more for the lesser amount produced than he would if he produced without limit. My bill provides simply that the Government make an offer to the farmers to help them solve their great farm problem, provided the farmers would contract to control the great overproduction and surplus menace.

It will be observed that the plan proposed by this bill would not become operative unless those planning 75 per cent of a basic commodity expressed such a desire by signing the proposed contract for surplus control. It is provided that 85 per cent of such planters must sign by the end of first year of operations, 95 per cent by the end of second year, and 97 per cent by the end of third year. The bill, therefore, contains a most splendid referendum. It does not go into effect or remain in effect unless an overwhelming majority of the farmers so declare. The bill would not in the least force the farmers to adopt a plan or policy not desired by them. It offers, to my mind, the best inducement ever proposed for organization by the farmers.

All other farm relief bills are either silent as to the all important factor of production control, or seek through penalties or other equally vicious methods, to control production. This plan seeks to control production and marketing by the voluntary act of the farmer, entered into as a part and parcel of the farm-relief scheme itself. All other bills dodge to a great extent this vital feature of surplus-production control. My bill recognizes this as the heart of the farm-relief plan and deals with it in a way that must be effective if operation is secured under the scheme. There can be no effective farm relief without effective production and marketing control. I repeat what I have said before:

Just as surely as we elevate prices without some sort of control of production, just so surely will the farmers themselves plant more corn and more cotton and more wheat and produce more and bring about the greater production. In other words, any bill which fails to have within it a proper control of production has failure written on its pages.

Under my bill there will be no need for any equalization fee, for the farmers would control the surplus problem effectively, as all farmers could hold their commodity and share in the high price without assuming an unfair burden. The bill has the most effective nonpremium insurance plan ever written. It would stop gambling. The farmers within reasonable limits would name their own prices.

The Government could not lose. There would be no subsidy. The debenture plan would provide indirect, doubtful relief. This plan would afford direct, certain relief. The plan is clear and definite and seeks to set up efficient, economically sound farm relief under the constitutional right of contract.

In conclusion let me say that, in my humble judgment, my bill would put the control of the farmer's great problems in the hands of his friends, not his enemies; would help the farmer directly and not indirectly; provide a complete solution of the overproduction problem; would enable the farmer within reasonable bounds to name his own price for his commodity; and would put him for the first time on a parity with other enterprises and industries.

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I thank you. Good night.

(Legislative day of Thursday, May 3, 1928)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the unfinished business, H. R. 1.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are a number of amendments that I intend now to propose to the bill. The amendments are mostly clerical in their nature. The committee authorized the experts to prepare the amendments, and I shall now offer them as the committee agreed to them. As I said, they are mostly clerical.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought we agreed the other day that the experts were to make all necessary clerical corrections.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will remember that there were some amendments that were not clerical and some that were. I wanted to clean up those amendments now which we did not have prepared at the time the bill was reported. I am quite sure the Senator will not object to them, because in the committee we were almost unanimous—in fact, I think we were completely unanimous—in reporting them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the purpose of the Senator is to perfect some majority amendments?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not object to that.
